

STANDARD WORKS PUBLISHED BY

New Edition [1880], with a Supplement of upwards of 4600 New Words and Meanings.

WEBSTER'S DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

NOTE.—The only authorized Editions of this Dictionary are those here described: no others published in England contain the Derivations and Etymological Notes of Dr. Mahn, who devoted several years to this portion of the Work.
See page 4.

WEBSTER'S GUINEA DICTIONARY

OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE. Thoroughly revised and improved by CHAUNCEY A. GOODRICH, D.D., LL.D., and NOAH PORTER, D.D., of Yale College.

The peculiar features of this volume, which render it perhaps the most useful Dictionary for general reference extant, as it is undoubtedly one of the cheapest books ever published, are as follows:—

1. Completeness.—It contains 114,000 words—more by 10,000 than any other Dictionary; and these are, for the most part, unusual or technical terms, for the explanation of which a Dictionary is most wanted.
2. Accuracy of Definition.—In this department the labours of Dr. Webster were most valuable, in correcting the faulty and redundant definitions of Dr. Johnson, which had previously been almost universally adopted. In the present edition all the definitions have been carefully and methodically analysed by W. G. Webster, Esq., the Rev. Chauncey Goodrich, Prof. Lyman, Prof. Whitney, and Prof. Gilman, with the assistance and under the superintendence of Prof. Goodrich.
3. Scientific and Technical Terms.—In order to secure the utmost completeness and accuracy of definition, this department has been subdivided among eminent Scholars and Experts, including Prof. Dana, Prof. Lyman, &c.
4. Etymology.—The eminent philologist, Dr. C. F. MAHN, has devoted five years to perfecting this department.
5. The Orthography is based as far as possible on Fixed Principles. In all cases of doubt an alternative spelling is given.
6. Pronunciation.—This has been entrusted to Mr. W. G. WEBSTER and Mr. WHEELER, assisted by other scholars. The pronunciation of each word is indicated by typographical signs, which are explained by reference to a KEY printed at the bottom of each page.
7. The Illustrative Citations.—No labour has been spared to embody such quotations from standard authors as may throw light on the definitions, or possess any special interest of thought or language.
8. The Synonyms.—These are subjoined to the words to which they belong, and are very complete.
9. The Illustrations, which exceed 3000, are inserted, not for the sake of ornament, but to elucidate the meaning of words which cannot be satisfactorily explained without pictorial aid.

The Volume contains 1628 pages, more than 3000 Illustrations, and is for One Guinea. It will be found, on comparison, to be one of the cheapest Volumes ever issued. Cloth, 21s.; half-bound in calf, 30s.; calf or half-russia, 31s. 6d.; russia, £2.

To be obtained through all Booksellers.

SECOND WORKS

WEBSTER'S COMPANION

Webster's Companion is a Dictionary of the English Language, with Etymology, and the Best Authorities. It contains additional Words and Phrases. Half-bound in Russia, 12s. 6d. Sent separately. 4to. 12s. 6d. Half-russia, 20s.

A Brief History of the English Language. Containing 12,000 Words. Literature not found in any other Dictionary. By T. LEWIS O.

A Catalogue of Corrupted Words which have been introduced into the English Language by False Derivation or Misapplication. By A. S. PALMER, Author of "A History of the English Language." 8vo. 21s.

A Catalogue of Synonymous Words, with their various Shades of Meaning. By the same Author. Demy 8vo. New Edition, revised and

An Exhaustive Dictionary of Quotations. From the English Poets. By W. H. M. A. F. S., F.L.S., &c. 4th Edition. Post 8vo. 6s. only persons and places are recommended of being entirely free from the but Monopoly of reading, and it everywhere bears evidence of a names of Monopoly must be, as we judge, nearly 8,000 quotations in the Monopoly of Tennyson.—Times.

A Dictionary of the English Language. By THOMPSON COOPER, F.S.A., and Time, and Joint Editor of "Athenae Cantabrigiae." 8vo. With Supplement to 1883. 15s. Supplement not yet published.

A Dictionary of the English Language. By THOMPSON COOPER, F.S.A., and Time, and Joint Editor of "Athenae Cantabrigiae." 8vo. With Supplement to 1883. 15s. Supplement not yet published.

Cottage Gardener's Dictionary. With a List of Ciphers, Monograms, and Marks. By R. E. GRAVES, British Museum. 8vo. 5s. each. Parts 1-5 ready.

A Dictionary of the English Language. By N. E. BROWN, Royal Herbarium, Kew. Post 8vo. 6d.

BELL & SONS, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN

New Edition [1880], with

WEBSTER'S DICTIONARY.

OF THE QUARTERLY REVIEW, Oct. 1878.

NOTE.—The only author faced before JOHNSON was followed by Webster, and those here described requirements, leading to better practical results."

contain the Deriva-

Mahn, who devoted se-

See page 4.

WEBSTER'S GUINEA

OF THE ENGLISH LANG

proved by CHANNOCY A. GOODE D.D., of Yale College.

The peculiar features of this volume, which Dictionary for general reference extant, as books ever published, are as follows:—

1. Completeness.—It contains 114,000 words—more by 10,000 than any other Dictionary; and these are, for the most part unusual or technical terms for the explanation of which a Dictionary is most wanted.

2. Accuracy of Definition.—In this department the labours of Dr. Webster were most valuable, in correcting the faulty and redundant definitions of Dr. Johnson, which had previously been almost universally adopted. In the present edition all the definitions have been carefully and methodically analysed by W. G. Webster, Esq., the Rev. Channocy Goodrich, Prof. Lyman, Prof. Whitney, and Prof. Gilman, with the assistance and under the superintendence of Prof. Goodrich.

3. Scientific and Technical Terms.—In order to secure the utmost completeness and accuracy of definition, this department has been subdivided among eminent Scholars and Experts including Prof. Dana, Prof. Lyman &c.

4. Etymology.—The eminent philologist, Dr. C. J. MAHN, has devoted five years to perfecting this department.

The Volume contains 1628 pages, more than 3000 Illustrations, for One Guinea. It will be found, on comparison, to be one of the most complete Volumes ever issued. (Cloth, 21s; half-bound in calf, 30s.; calf or leather, 31s. 6d.; Russia, £2.)

It is obtained through all Booksellers.

ST. JAMES'S GARDEN.

son of twenty languages, though never published, and his training placed him both in far in advance of Johnson as a philologist. The Dictionary of the English Language was published in 1755, and it appeared at once in England, where it kept it in the highest place as a practical Mean Dictionary in England has itself up the community of speech, to break up, not to English-speaking nations. It of this has been that the common "the Atlantic." . . .

Character of Webster's Dictionary, of distinctly suited as Johnson's was not much more than enlarged. It has so much novelty of plan. It is a Dictionary of 1864, published in a higher order than these last.

6. Fraud re-edited by other hands.

7. The Illustrations. It appears on its title-page the quotations from much of its especial interest throw light on the state of which was seen any special describe it in short as language.

8. The Synonyms. Men, among them joined to the words of compilation and are very complete and contributors.

9. The Illustrations. Most that he will are inserted, not for the most complete, as but to elucidate the point to Webster's which cannot be satisfied without pictorial aid. With the aid of

SPECIAL DICTIONARIES AND WORKS OF REFERENCE.

Dr. Richardson's Philological Dictionary of the ENGLISH LANGUAGE. Combining Explanation with Etymology, and copiously illustrated by Quotations from the Best Authorities. New Edition, with a Supplement containing additional Words and further Illustrations. In 2 vols. 4to. £4 14s. 6d. Half-bound in Russia, £5 15s. 6d. Russia, £6 12s.—The Supplement separately. 4to. 12s. An 8vo. edition, without the Quotations, 15s. Half-russia, 20s. Russia, 24s.

A Supplementary English Glossary. Containing 12,000 Words or Meanings occurring in English Literature not found in any other Dictionary. With Illustrative Quotations. By T. LEWIS O. DAVIES, M.A. Demy 8vo. 16s.

Folk-Etymology. A Dictionary of Corrupted Words which have been Perverted in Form or Meaning by False Derivation or Mistaken Analogy. By the Rev. A. S. PALMER, Author of "A Word-Hunter's Note-book." Demy 8vo. 21s.
"Most interesting, instructive, and valuable contribution to the study of language."—Athenæum.

Synonyms Discriminated. A Catalogue of Synonymous Words in the English Language, with their various Shades of Meaning, &c. Illustrated by Quotations from Standard Writers. By the late Ven. O. J. SMITH, M.A. Demy 8vo. New Edition, revised and enlarged. 14s.

A Dictionary of Quotations. From the English Poets. By HENRY G. BOHN, F.R.A.S., F.L.S., &c. 4th Edition. Post 8vo. 6s.
"Mr. Bohn's volume has the rare recommendation of being entirely free from the rubbish which is commonly thrust into similar collections. His selections have been made from a long and extensive course of reading, and it everywhere bears evidence of a scholar's eye and taste. There must be, as we judge, nearly 8,000 quotations in the volume, ranging from Chaucer to Tennyson."—Times.

A Biographical Dictionary. By THOMPSON COOPER, F.S.A., Editor of "Men of the Time," and Joint Editor of "Athenæ Cantabrigienses." 1 vol. 8vo. With Supplement to 1883. 15s. Supplement separate, 3s. 6d.

"It is an important original contribution to the literature of its class by a painstaking scholar. . . . It seems in every way admirable, and fully to justify the claims on its behalf put forth by its editor."—British Quarterly Review.

Bryan's Biographical and Critical Dictionary of Painters and Engravers. With a List of Ciphers, Monograms, and Marks. Enlarged Edition, thoroughly revised by R. E. GRAVES, British Museum. In monthly parts, 5s. each. Parts 1-5 ready.

Johnson's Cottage Gardener's Dictionary. With a Supplement, containing all the new plants and varieties to the year 1881. By N. E. BROWN, Royal Herbarium, Kew. Post 8vo. Cloth. 7s. 6d.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

THE ALDINE SERIES OF THE BRITISH POETS.

CHEAP EDITION.

In Fifty-two Volumes, Bound in Cloth, at Eighteenpence each Volume.

Akenside, with Memoir by the Rev.
A. DYCE, and additional Letters. 1s. 6d.

Beattie, with Memoir by the Rev.
A. DYCE. 1s. 6d.

Burns, with Memoir by Sir HARRIS
NICOLAS, and additional Copyright Pieces.
3 vols. 4s. 6d.

Butler, with Memoir by the Rev. J.
MITFORD. 2 vols. 3s.

Chaucer, edited by R. MORRIS, with Memoir by Sir HARRIS NICOLAS. 6 vols.
9s.

Churchill, Tooke's Edition, revised, with Memoir, by JAMES HANNAWAY. 2 vols.
3s.

Collins, edited, with Memoir, by W.
MOY THOMAS. 1s. 6d.

Cowper, including his Translations.
Edited, with Memoir, and Additional Copyright Pieces, by JOHN BRUCE, F.S.A.
3 vols. 4s. 6d.

Dryden, with Memoir by the Rev.
R. HOOPER, F.S.A. Carefully revised,
5 vols. 7s. 6d.

Falconer, with Memoir by the Rev.
J. MITFORD. 1s. 6d.

Goldsmith, with Memoir by the Rev.
J. MITFORD. Revised. 1s. 6d.

Gray, with Notes and Memoir by the Rev. JOHN MITFORD. 1s. 6d.

Kirke White, with Memoir by Sir H.
NICOLAS, and additional Notes. Carefully revised. 1s. 6d.

Milton, with Memoir by the Rev. J.
MITFORD. 3 vols. 4s. 6d.

Parnell, with Memoir by the Rev.
J. MITFORD. 1s. 6d.

Pope, with Memoir by the Rev. A.
DYCE. 3 vols. 4s. 6d.

Prior, with Memoir by the Rev. J.
MITFORD. 2 vols. 3s.

Shakespeare, with Memoir by the Rev. A. DYCE. 1s. 6d.

Spenser, edited, with Memoir, by
J. PAYNE COLLIER. 5 vols. 7s. 6d.

Surrey, edited, with Memoir, by
JAMES YEOWELL. 1s. 6d.

Swift, with Memoir by the Rev. J.
MITFORD. 3 vols. 4s. 6d.

Thomson, with Memoir by Sir H.
NICOLAS. Annotated by PETER CUNNING-HAM, F.S.A., and additional Poems, carefully revised. 2 vols. 3s.

Wyatt, edited, with Memoir, by
JAMES YEOWELL. 1s. 6d.

Young, with Memoir by the Rev. J.
MITFORD, and additional Poems. 2 vols.
3s.

Complete sets may be obtained, bound in half-morocco. £9 9s.

N.B.—Copies of the Fine Paper Edition, with Portraits, may still be had, price 5s. per volume (except Collins, 3s. 6d.).

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

GEORGE BELL & SONS.

POCKET VOLUMES.

A Series of Select Works of Favourite Authors, adapted for general reading, moderate in price, compact and elegant in form; and executed in a style fitting them to be permanently preserved. Imperial 32mo., cloth.

Gatty's Barables from Nature. 2 vols. 5s.

Captain Marryat's Masterman. Ready. 2s. 6d.

Lamb's Elia. Elia and Last Essay with Memoir, by BARRY CORNWALL. 2 vols. 5s.

Bacon's Essays. 2s. 6d.

Burns's Poems. 3s.

——— Songs. 3s.

Coleridge's Poems. 3s.

C. Dibdin's Sea Songs and Ballads. And others. 3s.

Midshipman, The. Autobiographical Sketches of his own early Career, by Captain BASIL HALL, R.N., F.R.S. 3s. 6d.

Lieutenant and Commander. By Captain BASIL HALL, R.N., F.R.S. 3s. 6d.

George Herbert's Poems. 2s. 6d.

——— Remains. 2s.

George Herbert's Works. 3s. 6d.

The Sketch Book. By WASHINGTON IRVING. 3s. 6d.

Tales of a Traveller. By WASHINGTON IRVING. 3s. 6d.

Charles Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare. 3s.

Longfellow's Evangeline and Voices, Sea-side, and Poems on Slavery. 3s.

Milton's Paradise Lost. 3s.

Regained, & other Poems. 3s.

Robin Hood Ballads. 3s.

Southey's Life of Nelson. 3s.

Walton's Complete Angler. Portraits and Illustrations. 3s.

——— Lives of Donne, Wotton, Hooker, &c. 3s. 6d.

White's Natural History of Selborne. 3s. 6d.

Shakspeare's Plays & Poems. KEIGHTLEY's Edition. 13 Vols. in cloth case, 21s.

ELZEVIR SERIES.

Small fcap. 8vo.

THESE Volumes are issued under the general title of "ELZEVIR SERIES," to distinguish them from other collections. This general title has been adopted to indicate the spirit in which they are prepared; that is to say, with the greatest possible accuracy as regards text, and the highest degree of beauty that can be attained in the workmanship.

They are printed at the Chiswick Press, on fine paper, with wide margins, and issued in a neat cloth binding.

Longfellow's Evangeline, Voices, Sea-side and Fire-side. 4s. 6d. With Portrait.

——— Hiawatha, and The Golden Legend. 4s. 6d.

——— Wayside Inn, Miles Standish, Spanish Student. 4s. 6d.

Burns's Poetical Works. 4s. 6d. With Portrait.

——— Songs and Ballads. 4s. 6d.

These Editions contain all the copyright pieces published in the Aldine Edition.

Cowper's Poetical Works. 2 vols., each 4s. 6d. With Portrait.

Coleridge's Poems. 4s. 6d. With Portrait.

Irving's Sketch Book. 5s. With Portrait.

——— Tales of a Traveller. 5s.

Milton's Paradise Lost. 4s. 6d. With Portrait.

——— Regained. 4s. 6d.

Shakspeare's Plays and Poems. Carefully edited by THOMAS KEIGHTLEY. In seven volumes. 5s. each.

Southey's Life of Nelson. 4s. 6d. With Portrait of NELSON.

Walton's Angler. 4s. 6d. With Frontispiece.

——— Lives of Donne, Hooker, Herbert, &c. 5s. With Portrait.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

HISTORY AND TRAVELS.

Rome and the Campagna. A Historical and Topographical Description of the Site, Buildings, and Neighbourhood of ancient Rome. By the Rev. ROBERT BURN, late Fellow and Tutor of Trinity College, Cambridge. With eighty engravings by JEWITT, and numerous Maps and Plans, and an Appendix, bringing the Work down to 1876. Demy 4to. £3 3s.

Old Rome. A Handbook of the Ruins of the Ancient City and the Campagna, for the use of Travellers. By R. BURN, M.A. With Illustrations, Maps, and Plans. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d.

Ancient Athens; its History, Topography, and Remains. By THOMAS HENRY DYER LL.D., Author of "The History of the Kings of Rome." Super-royal 8vo. Illustrated, cloth. £1 5s.

The History of the Kings of Rome. By Dr. T. H. DYER, Author of the "History of the City of Rome;" "Pompeii: its History, Antiquities," &c., with a Prefatory Dissertation on the Sources and Evidence of Early Roman History. 8vo. 16s.

Modern Europe, from the Fall of Constantinople in 1453. By THOMAS HENRY DYER, LL.D. Second Edition, Revised and Continued. In 5 vols. £2 12s. 6d.

The Decline of the Roman Republic. By the late GEORGE LONG, M.A., Editor of "Caesar's Commentaries," "Cicero's Orations," &c. 8vo.
Vol. I. From the Destruction of Carthage to the End of the Jugurthine War. 14s.
Vol. II. To the Death of Sertorius. 14s.
Vol. III. Including the third Mithridatic War, the Catiline Conspiracy, and the Consulship of C. Julius Caesar. 14s.
Vol. IV. History of Caesar's Gallic Campaigns and of contemporaneous events. 14s.
Vol. V. From the Invasion of Italy by Julius Caesar to his Death. 14s.

A History of England during the Early and Middle Ages. By C. H. PEARSON, M.A., Fellow of Oriel College, Oxford, and late Lecturer in History at Trinity College, Cambridge. Second Edition, revised and enlarged. 8vo.
Vol. I. to the Death of Cœur de Lion. 16s. Vol. II. to the Death of Edward I. 14s.

Historical Maps of England. By C. H. PEARSON, M.A.
Folio. Third Edition, revised. 31s. 6d.
An Atlas containing Five Maps of England at different periods during the Early and Middle Ages.

The Desert of the Exodus. Journeys on Foot in the Wilderness of the Forty Years' Wanderings, undertaken in connection with the Ordnance Survey of Sinai and the Palestine Exploration Fund. By the late E. H. PALMER, M.A., Lord Almoner's Professor of Arabic and Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, Member of the Asiatic Society, and of the Société de Paris. With Maps, and numerous Illustrations from Photographs and Drawings taken on the spot by the Sinai Survey Expedition and C. F. TYERWHITT DRAKE. 2 vols. 8vo. 28s.

STANDARD WORKS.

Corpus Poetarum Latinorum. Edited by E. WALKER.

One thick vol. 8vo. Cloth, 18s.

Containing:—Catullus, Lucretius, Virgilius, Tibullus, Propertius, Ovidius, H. Martius, Phaedrus, Lucanus, Persius, Juvenalis, Martialis, Sulpicia, Statius, Silius Italicus, Valerius Flaccus, Calpurnius Siculus, Ausonius, and Claudianus.

Cruden's Concordance to the Old and New Testament, or an Alphabetical and Classified Index to the Holy Bible, specially adapted for Sunday School Teachers, containing nearly 54,000 references. Thoroughly revised and condensed by G. H. HANNAH. Fcap. 2s.

Perowne (Canon). The Book of Psalms. A New

Translation, with Introductions and Notes, Critical and Explanatory. By the Very Rev. J. J. STEWART PEROWNE, Dean of Peterborough. 8vo. Vol. I., Fifth Edition, 18s.; Vol. II., Fifth Edition, 16s.

— ABRIDGED EDITION for Schools. Fifth Edition. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

Adams (Dr. E.). The Elements of the English Language. By ERNEST ADAMS, Ph.D. Twentieth Edition. Post 8vo. 4s. 6d.

Whewell (Dr.). Elements of Morality, including Polity.

By W. WHEWELL, D.D., formerly Master of Trinity College, Cambridge. Fourth Edition. In 1 vol. 8vo. 16s.

BIOGRAPHIES BY THE LATE SIR ARTHUR HELPS, K.C.B.

The Life of Hernando Cortes, and the Conquest of MEXICO. Dedicated to Thomas Carlyle. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 16s.

The Life of Christopher Columbus, the Discoverer of AMERICA. Fourth Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

The Life of Pizarro. With Some Account of his Associates in the Conquest of Peru. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

The Life of Las Casas, the Apostle of the Indies Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

The Life and Epistles of St. Paul. By THOMAS LEWIN

Esq., M.A., F.S.A., Trinity College, Oxford, Barrister-at-Law, Author of "Fast Sacri," "Siege of Jerusalem," "Caesar's Invasion," "Treatise on Trusts," &c. With upwards of 350 Illustrations finely engraved on Wood, Maps, Plans, &c. Fourth Edition. In 2 vols., demy 4to. £2 2s.

"This is one of those works which demand from critics and from the public, before attempting to estimate its merits in detail, an unqualified tribute of admiration. The first glance tells us that the book is one on which the leisure of a busy lifetime and the whole resources of an enthusiastic author have been lavished without stint. . . . This work is a kind of British Museum for this period and subject in small compass. It is a series of galleries of statues, gems, coins, documents, letters, books, and relics, through which the reader may wander at leisure, and which he may animate with his own musings and reflections. It must be remembered throughout that this delightful and instructive collection is the result of the devotion of a lifetime, and deserves as much honour and recognition as many a museum or picture-gallery which has preserved its donor's name for generations."

—Times.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN

STANDARD WORKS PUBLISHED BY

ILLUSTRATED OR POPULAR EDITIONS OF STANDARD WORKS.

Dante's Divine Comedy. Translated by the Rev. HENRY FRANCIS CARY. With all the Author's Copyright Emendations. Post 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Shakespeare. Shakespeare's Plays and Poems. With Notes and Life by CHARLES KNIGHT, and 40 engravings on wood by HARVEY. Royal 8vo. Cloth. 10s. 6d.

Fielding. Works of Henry Fielding, complete. With Memoir of the Author by THOMAS ROSCOE, and 20 Plates by GEORGE CRUIKSHANK. Medium 8vo. 14s.

Fielding. The Novels separately. With Memoir by THOMAS ROSCOE, and Plates by GEORGE CRUIKSHANK. Medium 8vo. 7s. 6d.

Swift. Works of Jonathan Swift, D.D. Containing interesting and valuable passages not hitherto published. With Memoir of the Author by THOMAS ROSCOE. 2 vols. Medium 8vo. 24s.

Smollett. Miscellaneous Works of Tobias Smollett. Complete in 1 vol. With Memoir of the Author by THOMAS ROSCOE. 21 Plates by GEORGE CRUIKSHANK. Medium 8vo. 14s.

Lamb. The Works of Charles Lamb. With a Memoir by Sir THOMAS NOON TALFOURD. Imp. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

Cruikshank's Table-Book. With 128 Illustrations.

— The Omnibus. With 100 Illustrations.

FINE-PAPER EDITIONS. India-paper impressions of the Steel Plates, printed in brown ink. Imperial 8vo, bound, £1 11s. 6d. each vol. These Editions are limited to 300 copies each for this country and the United States.

— The Fairy Library. Consisting of "Hop o' My Thumb," "Puss in Boots," "Cinderella," and "Jack and the Beanstalk." With numerous Etchings. Bound, 10s. 6d.

A FINE-PAPER EDITION, in fcap. 4to, the Plates printed in brown ink on India-paper. 500 copies only printed.

Adelaide Anne Procter's Legends and Lyrics. The Illustrated Edition. With Additional Poems, and an Introduction by CHARLES DICKENS, a Portrait by JEENS, and 20 Illustrations by Eminent Artists, and a short Memoir by Mrs. EWING. Fcap. 4to. Ornamental cloth. 21s.

Mrs. Gatty's Parables from Nature. A Handsomely Illustrated Edition; with Notes on the Natural History, and numerous Full-page Illustrations by the most eminent Artists of the present day. New complete edition, with Short Memoir by J. H. EWING. Fcap. 4to. 21s.

The Book of Gems. Selections from the British POETS. Illustrated with upwards of 150 Steel Engravings. Edited by B. C. HALL. 3 vols. Handsomely bound in walnut. 21s. each.

FIRST SERIES—CHAUCER TO DRYDEN.

SECOND SERIES—SWIFT TO BURNS.

THIRD SERIES—WORDSWORTH TO TENNYSON.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

GEORGE BELL & SONS.

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

CAPTAIN MARRYAT'S BOOKS FOR BOYS.

Poor Jack. With Sixteen Illustrations after Designs by CLARKSON STANFIELD, R.A. Twenty-second Edition. Post 8vo., 3s. 6d. Gilt, 4s. 6d.

——— People's Edition, Illustrated. Demy 4to., 6d.

——— Cheap Edition. Fcap. 8vo., 6d.

The Mission; or, Scenes in Africa. With Illustrations by JOHN GILBERT. Post 8vo., 3s. 6d. Gilt, 4s. 6d.

The Settlers in Canada. With Illustrations by GILBERT and DALZIEL. Post 8vo., 3s. 6d. Gilt, 4s. 6d.

The Privateers Man. Adventures by Sea and Land IN CIVIL AND SAVAGE LIFE, ONE HUNDRED YEARS AGO. Illustrated with Eight Steel Engravings. Post 8vo., 3s. 6d. Gilt, 4s. 6d.

Masterman Ready; or, the Wreck of the Pacific. Embellished with Ninety-three Engravings on Wood. Post 8vo., 3s. 6d. Gilt, 4s. 6d.

——— People's Edition, Illustrated. Demy 4to., 6d.

——— Cheap Edition. Fcap. 8vo., 6d.

——— New Illustrated Edition. With 60 Original Woodcuts. Post 8vo., 5s.

The Pirate and Three Cutters. Illustrated with Eight Steel Engravings from Drawings by CLARKSON STANFIELD, R.A. With a Memoir of the Author. Post 8vo., 3s. 6d. Gilt, 4s. 6d.

A Boy's Locker. A Smaller Edition of the above Tales, in 12 volumes, enclosed in a compact cloth box. 21s.

Hans Christian Andersen's Tales for Children. With Forty-eight Full-page Illustrations by Wehnert, and Fifty-seven Small Engravings on Wood by W. THOMAS. A new Edition. Very handsomely bound. 6s.

Hans Christian Andersen's Fairy Tales and Sketches. Translated by C. C. PRACHEY, H. WARD, A. PLESNER, &c. With 104 Illustrations by OTTO SPECKTER and others. 6s.

This volume contains several tales that are in no other Edition published in this country, and with the above volume it forms the most complete English Edition.

Mrs. Alfred Gatty's Presentation Box for Young PEOPLE. Containing "Parables from Nature," "Aunt Judy's Tales," and other Popular Books, 9 volumes in all, beautifully printed, neatly bound, and enclosed in a cloth box. 31s. 6d. Any single volume at 3s. 6d.

Anecdotes of Dogs. By EDWARD JESSE. With Illustrations. Post 8vo. Cloth. 5s. With Thirty-four Steel Engravings after COOPER, LANDSEER, &c. 7s. 6d.

The Natural History of Selborne. By GILBERT WHITE. Edited by JESSE. Illustrated with Forty Engravings. Post 8vo. 5s.; or with the Plates Coloured, 7s. 6d.

A Poetry Book for Schools. Illustrated with Thirty-seven highly-finished Engravings by C. W. COPE, R.A., HELMSLEY, PALMER, SKILL, THOMAS, and H. WEIR. Crown 8vo. 1s.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET COVENT GARDEN.

SOWERBY'S ENGLISH BOTANY:

Containing a Description and Life-size coloured Drawing of every British Plant. Edited and brought up to the Present Standard of Scientific Knowledge by T. BOSWELL, LL.D., F.L.S., &c. With Popular Descriptions of the Uses, History, and Traditions of each Plant, by Mrs. LANKESTER, Author of "Wild Flowers Worth Notice," "The British Ferns," &c. The Figures by J. E. SOWERBY, JAMES SOWERBY, F.L.S., J. DR. C. SOWERBY, F.L.S., and J. W. SALTER, A.L.S. In Eleven Volumes, super-royal 8vo.; or in 83 Parts 5s. each.

"Under the editorship of T. Boswell Syme, F.L.S., assisted by Mrs. Lankester, 'Sowerby's English Botany,' when finished, will be exhaustive of the subject, and worthy of the branch of science it illustrates. . . . In turning over the charmingly executed hand-coloured plates of British plants which encumber these volumes with riches, the reader cannot help being struck with the beauty of many of the humblest flowering weeds we tread on with careless step. We cannot dwell upon many of the individuals grouped in the splendid bouquet of flowers presented in these pages, and it will be sufficient to state that the work is pledged to contain a figure of every wild flower indigenous to these isles."—Times.

"Will be the most complete Flora of Great Britain ever brought out. This great work will find a place wherever botanical science is cultivated, and the study of our native plants, with all their fascinating associations, held dear."—Athenæum.

"A clear, bold, distinctive type enables the reader to take in at a glance the arrangement and divisions of every page. And Mrs. Lankester has added to the technical description by the editor an extremely interesting popular sketch, which follows in smaller type. The English, French, and German popular names are given, and, wherever that delicate and difficult step is at all practicable, their derivation also. Medical properties, superstitions and fancies, and poetic tributes and illusions, follow. In short there is nothing more left to be desired."—Guardian.

"Without question, this is the standard work on Botany, and indispensable to every botanist. . . . The plates are most accurate and beautiful, and the entire work cannot be too strongly recommended to all who are interested in botany."—Illustrated News.

Sold separately, prices as follows:—

		Round cloth.	Half morocco.	Morocco elegant.
		£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
Vol. I. (Seven Parts)	1 18 0	2 2 0	2 8 6
II. ditto	1 18 0	2 2 0	2 8 6
III. (Eight Parts)	2 8 0	2 7 0	2 13 6
IV. (Nine Parts)	2 8 0	2 12 0	2 18 6
V. (Eight Parts)	2 3 0	2 7 0	2 13 6
VI. (Seven Parts)	1 18 0	2 2 0	2 8 6
VII. ditto	1 18 0	2 2 0	2 8 6
VIII. (Ten Parts)	2 13 0	2 17 0	3 3 6
IX. (Seven Parts)	1 18 0	2 2 0	2 8 6
X. ditto	1 18 0	2 2 0	2 8 6
XI. (Six Parts)	1 13 0	1 17 0	2 8 6

Or, the Eleven Volumes, 22l. 8s. in cloth; 24l. 12s. in half-morocco; and 28l. 3s. 6d. whole morocco.

Volume XII., by Prof. BOSWELL, containing ferns and other cryptogamous plants, with an Index to the whole work, is now being issued. Parts I.—V., with coloured plates, now ready, price 5s. each.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

LIBRARY OF NATURAL HISTORY.

"Each volume is elegantly printed in royal 8vo., and illustrated with a very large number of well-executed engravings, printed in colours. . . . They form a complete library of reference on the several subjects to which they are devoted, and nothing more complete in their way has lately appeared."—The Bookseller.

BREE'S BIRDS OF EUROPE AND THEIR EGGS, not observed in the British Isles. With 252 beautifully coloured Plates. Five vols. 5*l.* 5*s.*

COUCH'S HISTORY OF THE FISHES OF THE BRITISH ISLANDS. With 252 carefully coloured Plates. Four vols. 4*l.* 4*s.*

GATTY'S (MRS. ALFRED) BRITISH SEaweEDS. Numerous coloured Illustrations. Two vols. 2*l.* 10*s.*

HIBBERD'S (SHIRLEY) NEW AND RARE BEAUTIFUL-LEAVED PLANTS. With 64 coloured Full-page Illustrations. Executed expressly for this work. One vol. 1*l.* 5*s.*

LOWE'S NATURAL HISTORY OF BRITISH AND EXOTIC FERNS. With 479 finely coloured Plates. Eight vols. 6*l.* 6*s.*

LOWE'S OUR NATIVE FERNS. Illustrated with 79 coloured Plates and 900 Wood Engravings. Two vols. 2*l.* 2*s.*

LOWE'S NATURAL HISTORY OF NEW AND RARE FERNS. Containing Species and Varieties not included in "Ferns, British and Exotic." 72 coloured Plates and Woodcuts. One vol. 1*l.* 1*s.*

LOWE'S NATURAL HISTORY OF BRITISH GRASSES. With 74 finely coloured Plates. One vol. 1*l.* 1*s.*

LOWE'S BEAUTIFUL-LEAVED PLANTS: being a description of the most beautiful-leaved Plants in cultivation in this country. With 60 coloured Illustrations. One vol. 1*l.* 1*s.*

MAUNDS' BOTANIC GARDEN. New Edition. Edited by J. C. NIVEN, Curator of the Botanic Gardens, Hull. With 250 coloured Plates, giving 1247 figures. Six vols. 12*l.* 12*s.*

MORRIS' HISTORY OF BRITISH BIRDS. With 360 finely coloured Engravings. Six vols. 6*l.* 6*s.*

MORRIS' NESTS AND EGGS OF BRITISH BIRDS. With 223 beautifully coloured Engravings. Three vols. 3*l.* 3*s.*

MORRIS' BRITISH BUTTERFLIES. With 71 beautifully coloured Plates. One vol. 1*l.* 1*s.*

MORRIS' BRITISH MOTHS. With coloured Illustrations of nearly 2000 specimens. Four vols. 6*l.* 6*s.*

TRIPP'S BRITISH MOSSES. With 39 coloured Plates, containing a figure of each species. Two vols. 2*l.* 10*s.*

WOOSTER'S ALPINE PLANTS First Series. With 54 coloured Plates. 2*s.*

WOOSTER'S ALPINE PLANTS. Second Series. With 54 coloured Plates. 2*s.*

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

STANDARD WORKS

PUBLISHED BY

GEORGE BELL & SONS.

* * * For List of BOHN'S LIBRARIES see the end of the Volume.

L E · V A N A .

LEVANA

OR,

THE DOCTRINE OF EDUCATION.

BY

JEAN PAUL FRIEDRICH RICHTER.

• Translated from the German

PRECEDED BY

A SHORT BIOGRAPHY OF THE AUTHOR,

AND

HIS AUTOBIOGRAPHY, A FRAGMENT.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL AND SONS, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

1884.

LONDON :

PRINTED BY WILLIAM CLOWES AND SONS, LIMITED, STAMFORD STREET AND CHARING CROSS.

PREFACE

TO THE

ORIGINAL TRANSLATION OF LEVANA.

At a time when the public mind is so fully awakened to the importance of education, it appeared to the Translator that the thoughts of one of the greatest Germans on the subject were worthy of deep consideration; and he offers them with the more satisfaction because he believes it impossible either for the advocates or for the opponents of the government scheme of education to draw offensive weapons from this arsenal. For LEVANA treats neither of national nor congregational education; it elevates neither state nor priest into educator; but it devolves that duty, where the interest ever ought to be, on the parents, and particularly on the mother.

It is far from the Translator's object to disparage the great efforts now making to improve the state of popular education; but he believes that, in propounding general systems, it is too much forgotten that real education is the work of individuals on individuals. It may be necessary—it is necessary—to provide instruction, and, as far as possible, education, for the classes who are too ignorant to seek it for themselves. But let us not, in the mania for systems, forget how little these alone can effect. And, farther we would ask, is the education of the upper classes so perfect that they may leave all care for it to watch over only that of the lower? If there be much of crime—the acknowledged consequence of ignorance—among the masses, is there less of vice—the equally sure accompaniment of bad education—among the higher grades of society?

In the belief that LEVANA may tend much to ameliorate that department of education which is most neglected and needs most care—home training—the Translator makes no apology for clothing it in an English dress. He is, indeed, surprised that it has not previously been presented to the English reader. But like all Richter's writings, LEVANA is peculiarly characterised by that union of qualities called in England—"German." This feature, especially when displayed in a work on so serious a subject as education, and being most strongly marked in the introductory chapters, on which the reception of a book so much depends, may have led to its being considered unsuitable to English taste. The early part indeed, may cause many to close the book who would find much both to interest and instruct in a patient perusal of the whole work, combining as it does, in a remarkable degree, sound practical sense with fanciful and varied illustration. The acknowledged difficulty of Richter's style has also, doubtless, had a deterring effect. Those who are acquainted with his writings will be able to appreciate the difficulties which have beset the Translator, and will be the least inclined to judge harshly the shortcomings of the translation, as compared with its great original. For who—save Carlyle—can hope to do justice to the humorous, pathetic, poetic Richter; to him whom his countrymen call "Jean Paul, der Einzige"?

The Translator thinks it right to add that he has occasionally omitted, or compressed, a few sentences, where the general usefulness of the work was obviously increased by so doing. This discretion has, however, been very sparingly used, and in no case so as to interfere with the scope of the original.

A. H.

LIVERPOOL, 1848.

PREFACE TO THIS EDITION.

In this edition, the passages alluded to above have been inserted in full, and the whole work has undergone a careful revision under the eye of the original translator.

The Autobiography is here for the first time published in this country; as it deals only with the earlier portion of the author's life it has been supplemented by a short memoir condensed from the enthusiastic biography by E. Förster. Both these are by another translator.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
PREFACE TO THE ORIGINAL TRANSLATION OF LEVANA	v
PREFACE TO THIS EDITION	vi
BIOGRAPHY	xi

AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

LECTURE I. Wonsiedel—Birth—Grandfather	3
LECTURE II. Embracing the period from 1st of August, 1765, to the 9th of January, 1776—Joditz— ^a Village Idyls	11
LECTURE III. (with three Supplements). Schwarzenbach-on-the-Saale—Kiss—Rector—Lord's Supper	52

LEVANA;

OR,

THE DOCTRINE OF EDUCATION.

FIRST FRAGMENT.

CHAP. I. Importance of Education	83
II. Inaugural Discourse at the Johanneum-Paullinum; or Proof that Education effects little	86
III. Importance of Education	99

SECOND FRAGMENT.

	PAGE
CHAP. I. Spirit and Principle of Education	106
II. To discover and to appreciate the Individuality of the Ideal Man	111
III. On the Spirit of the Age	117
IV. Religious Education	125

THIRD FRAGMENT.

I. The Beginning of Education	137
II. The Joyousness of Children	146
III. Games of Children	151
IV. Children's Dances	162
V. Music	164
VI. Commands, Prohibitions, Punishments, and Crying .	166
VII. Punishments	173
VIII. Screaming and Crying of Children	179
IX. On the Trustfulness of Children	183

APPENDIX TO THE THIRD FRAGMENT. On Physical Education .	188
COMIC APPENDIX AND EPILOGUE TO THE FIRST VOLUME. A dreamed Letter to the late Professor Gellert, in which the Author begs for a Tutor	205

FOURTH FRAGMENT: ON FEMALE EDUCATION.

CHAP. I.	216
II. On the Destination of the Female Sex	222
III. Nature of Girls	227
IV. Education of Girls.	238
V. Private Instructions of a Prince to the Governess of his Daughter	269

FIFTH FRAGMENT.

CHAP. I. On the Education of a Prince	281
---	-----

SIXTH FRAGMENT. ON THE MORAL EDUCATION OF BOYS.

CHAP. I.	311
II. Truthfulness	329
III. Education of the Affections	338
IV. Supplementary Appendix to Moral Education . .	350

CONTENTS.

ix

SEVENTH FRAGMENT.

PAGE

CHAP. I. On the Development of the Desire for Intellectual Progress	366
II. Speech and Writing	369
III. Attention, and the Power of Adaptive Combination .	375
IV. Development of Wit	382
V. Development of Reflection, Abstraction, and Self-Knowledge; together with an extra Paragraph on the Powers of Action and Business	387
VI. On the Education of the Recollection—not of the Memory	389

EIGHTH FRAGMENT.

CHAP. I. Development of the Sense of Beauty	395
II. Classical Education	400

NINTH FRAGMENT, or Key-stone 405

BIOGRAPHY.

§1. BIRTH.—PARENTAGE.—EARLY YEARS.

IN the spring of the year 1763 Jean Paul Friedrich Richter was born at Wonsiedel, a town of Baireuth, in Bavaria, on the range of hills known as the Fichtelgebirge. His father, Johann Christian Christoph Richter, was the son of a schoolmaster of Neustadt, of whom little is known but that he was "poor and pious in a high degree." Both these characteristics Paul's father appears to have inherited, though perhaps in a somewhat modified measure. He was a man of stern and uncompromising but cheerful and kind disposition, with a vigorous nature which could hold its own against the ills of life. Paul's mother, Sophia Rosina, was the daughter of Johann Paul Kuhn, a cloth-weaver of the neighbouring village of Hof. About two years after Paul's birth his father received a clerical appointment at Joditz, a village not far distant, which gave him a small increase of income. Here he remained for ten years, during which time Paul appears to have enjoyed a happy childhood, or one at any rate to which he looked back with feelings of much pleasure. That he made small progress in book-learning was doubtlessly owing more to the shortcomings of the teachers than of the taught, since he showed much fondness for books and eagerly read such literature as fell into his hands. This consisted mainly of a few theological books of his father's—of which he understood not a word,—and some old newspapers. For a short time he went to school, but his father soon withdrew him on account of some ill-treatment which he had received at the hands of another boy, and he and his brother Adam were in future taught at home. The instruction they received seems to have consisted entirely of learning by heart—either pages of Latin words or grammar, or Scripture texts. With so little intellectual nourishment, it is not surprising that he showed no signs of remarkable mental growth while at Joditz.

It was in Paul's thirteenth year that his father received what promised to be a better living in Schwarzenbach-on-the-Saale. For the boy this was a decided gain. Here he had many advantages which had before been wanting, not the least of which was access to a more plentiful supply of books in the library of a friend, a young man named Vogel. The master too of the school seems to have taken pride in his promising pupil, and under his tuition Paul acquired some little knowledge of Latin and Greek, and even made a beginning with Hebrew. Now too he first had some lessons in music, for which he had decided talent, inherited from his father who, Paul tells us, was a composer of church music and had erred in not devoting himself entirely to the Tone Muse. A young curate also took an interest in Paul and obtained his father's permission to have him for two hours in the afternoon to give him instruction in geography, philosophy, and theology. For the former of these he appears however to have had little liking, and consequently to have made no progress therein, but in the study of philosophy and theology he was as it were in his natural element. The exercises which he did for the curate were his first attempts at composition.*

* The reader is here recommended to turn to the Autobiography, where he will find a full account of the first fourteen years of Richter's life.

§ 2. HIGH SCHOOL.—FRIENDS.—FIRST LITERARY EFFORTS.
1779—1781.

In the Easter of the year 1779, Richter, being then sixteen years of age, was sent to the high school at Hof. In Schwarzenbach he had unconsciously acquired knowledge and developed a power of thought which raised him far above his school-fellows, above the school—certainly not a very remarkable one—and beyond his own years. Werner the kind old Rector* of the school and Völkel the curate, a younger man of much ability, doubtlessly contributed considerably to this precocious development, but perhaps he owed most to Vogel, the pastor of the neighbouring village of Rehan, a man of wit and benevolence, who took an interest in the clever boy, and gave him the range—though with certain limitations—of a well-stored library. The high school at Hof offered scanty means for intellectual development. Neither the Rector* nor the Conrector evinced any particular talent for teaching, and Richter was thus thrown almost entirely on himself and his former studies, in following up his predilection for philosophy; the study of history to which he had before been indifferent now became thoroughly distasteful through the dryness and tediousness of the lectures.

In addition to this intellectual want he had also other trials, as the following anecdote will show, which though slight and insignificant in themselves were bitter and painful for a sensitive disposition such as his.

After the entrance examination Richter was pronounced fit for the upper Prima,* but at the request of his father, who feared the envy of his school-fellows, he was enrolled among the middle Primaners. Even this degree of preference was unheard of and awakened the feelings, which his father had feared, in some of the other boys, who resolved in school-boy fashion to have their revenge. This they did by telling him that it was the custom and duty of all new members of the Prima to kiss the hand of the master at the first French lesson, and Richter, in fulfilment of this supposed duty, innocently and respectfully sought the reluctant hand, but his master, who, being no favourite, supposed it to be some fresh insult, all the more stinging as coming from a new boy, rushed at the innocent lad in a burst of passion and then left the room with a volley of oaths, whilst the new Primaner stood there outwitted and derided by the companions in whom he had hoped to find friends. One only of them, Christian Otto, took no part in the general uproar, and sowed in that hour the seed of a friendship which lasted throughout their lives.

For the explanation of this and following titles see, Autobiography,

An occurrence of a different sort however soon raised Richter again to his right place among his school-fellows. It was the custom at the school for the boys to hold debates under the presidency of the Rector, who decided on the respective merits of the two parties. When Richter's turn came to lead the opposition, the Rector had chosen a theological subject. Partly from natural bent and partly from intercourse with his decidedly rationalistic old friends in Schwarzenbach and Rehau, Richter already inclined to heterodoxy, and had acquired through his private reading, an amount of knowledge of which no one, least of all the Rector, had any idea and which in the debate—to him no school exercise, but a matter of feeling—he used as weapons against his opponent and against the Rector with his sacred and infallible doctrines.

His opponent with ordinary schoolboy knowledge was soon reduced to silence, while the Rector himself from lack of means, strove equally vainly against the young rationalist, who, encouraged by his success, proceeded more and more boldly until at last the Rector in despair took refuge in the authority of his office, and commanding silence, left the chair and the room without the usual concluding ceremony. Richter was thus acknowledged victorious by the whole class and respected accordingly.

The first friendship which Richter made was with the above-mentioned Christian Otto, who was the son of a well-to-do commercial man and a youth whose thoughtfulness and appreciation of right and duty were supplemented by cordial manners and an affectionate disposition. He afterwards became Richter's chief confidant in his literary plans and undertakings, and his censor and adviser, as may be seen from their correspondence.*

The honour of being chosen to speak at the yearly Actus or Speech-day was conferred on Richter in both the years that he was at school. The speeches recited on these days were the original compositions of the boys who were also allowed to select their own subjects. Those chosen by Richter, viz., "The Value of the early Study of Philosophy," and "The Importance of the Discovery of New Truths"† are characteristic. The peculiar tendency of his mind,—an enthusiasm for knowledge, a keenness of thought and tenderness of feeling are very apparent in both, but in the latter is especially seen a maturity of mind in his zeal for universal culture and progress which even in his sixteenth year he plainly distinguished from the superficial and transitory desire for radical destruction.

Jean Paul's Briefwechsel mit seinem Freunde Otto. Berlin, 1829. Otto outlived his friend some years, and is the editor of one of his biographies. (Wahrheit aus Jean Paul's Leben.)

† The former is printed in Jean Paul's Sämmtliche Werke, 1st ed. vol. lxiii.; the last named appears to be the earlier in date.

In addition to his school classes and school work, Richter employed himself in a manner which, although he was still quite unconscious of it himself, decidedly foreshadowed his future vocation and which laid the foundation both of a comprehensive knowledge and of an unexampled wealth of thought. He made a library—a double one, we may say—with his own hand. First he took copious extracts from all the books that he read, the contents of which he thought of any importance, and entered them carefully in note books, providing each with two indexes, one of the writings from which he took the extracts, and one of the subjects of the extracts. At Schwarzenbach-on-the-Saale, when still a lad, he had already begun this work, and in the year 1778, he had filled two quarto books of above two hundred closely written pages. At the commencement of the year 1779 he completed another in Schwarzenbach and two more in Hof; in 1780 five more, and so on, with untiring zeal. Throughout his life he continued this method of retaining in his memory all that he read, but in later years he did it more briefly. He himself says, in one of the books of a later period, “To have my life’s history, I need only open my extract books; with each one is connected a portion of my life.” The extracts treat chiefly of such subjects as the Eternity of Hell Punishment—the Works of the Devil—the Connection Natural and Christian Religions—Love towards Enemies—the Atonement—Faith—Original Sin—and so on; also epigrams and poems, comic and sentimental. In the second volume are: Connexion of the Body and Soul—the Diversity of the Senses—What is Beauty?—Blind religious Zeal—Eating and Drinking—What would Man be, if he were not immortal?—Spinoza’s Divinity. It would require too great a space to give these in detail; each book contained on an average several hundred subjects; it is enough that we comprehend what a mass of knowledge he acquired in his earliest youth, how he selected it in accordance with the bent of his mind, and arranged it for study and future use. Not less important to him, and to us more significant, was the second part of his MS. library—the records of his own thoughts and researches. With the same order and neatness he commenced these books for “Exercises in Thinking,” in which he wrote down his philosophical speculations and religious reflections. These he kept with the same care as his extracts, although he expressly denied that they had any value for other people. The first volume begins in November 1780. Besides a number of disconnected notes it contains seven treatises with such titles as, “The Nature of our Conception of God,” “A Thing without Force is an Impossibility,” “Is the World a perpetuum mobile?” A second volume, with similar contents, was added in December of the same year, and many others followed. The following extracts will serve as specimens:

Fools and Wise Men, Blockheads and Geniuses.

“These appellations do not indicate the same things, though they are often confounded. Their difference is easily detected.

“The Blockhead is a being to be pitied; one whose intellect never grasps more than a small number of ideas; and who, enshrouded in deep darkness, is never illumined by the beams of truth; the Blockhead is the polypus between man and the animals. The Fool is not so at all. Most are fools because they know too much or more than is good for them. They know much, but become fools just because they apply it all badly. The Blockhead is born, the Fool made. The Blockhead creeps along like the snail for slowness, for he is far behind on the road of truth and incapable of advancing. He is on the right road perhaps, but is it to be wondered at, that he who has gone only a few steps from the gate has not yet lost his way? The Fool is on in front, but he has left the right road and wanders without guidance. The Blockhead is not recognised at once, for in common with the Wise Man, he says little and does not betray himself. Often, too, he adopts the mask of the Wise Man, as the donkey assumes the lion's skin—the dress is not becoming to either, but only the sharp-sighted can unmask them. The Fool, on the contrary, is apparent at once; for he bears a mark of his own, which distinguishes him from others, as the uniform does the soldier. In fact he is not as others are. The Fool says all that he thinks—and this betrays him at once. We should find more Blockheads in the world if more people were open enough to give utterance to their thoughts. The Blockhead is a Blockhead for this reason, that he is not one of the animals; among them he would pass for a Genius. The Fool is a Fool for this reason, that he does not live in a particular world which is not the real one, namely, in that one which exists in his own head, where he would be considered clever. The Blockhead cannot be cured, because he is born one—he is a feeble creature, whose powers cannot be increased. The Fool can be rendered better just because he is able to become worse. He is a strong man, whose powers are badly employed; nothing is necessary but to turn them in another direction. Madness is the highest degree of foolishness—and this is cured now-a-days. In sleep we are all Fools, and this because we have lost our guides, the senses. The Blockhead is not one when in sleep—he is then an embryo—he does not think at all. The fault in the Blockhead is that he has no imagination; the Fool, on the contrary, is one because he has too much imagination. Thus is the poet in danger of becoming a Fool. Hence comes the much praised furore poeticus. The Blockhead has his counterpart among the animals; not so the Fool. This indicates that the latter is more nearly allied to man than the former. All men are subject at times to foolishness and the greatest oftenest of any; but only a small number are stupid. One is stupid continually, but one is a fool for a short time only. The heart of the Blockhead is little capable of noble emotions; that of the Fool is open to all, provided only that they do not touch the whims which render him a fool. Fools are confined or put in fetters; but Blockheads are allowed full liberty. They often fill the lecturer's chair, or the pulpit—they sit on thrones. Often nothing more is necessary in order to obtain an office than to be a Blockhead; for he who has to bestow it has sympathy for those who resemble himself—he appreciates in others that which he values in himself. Fools and Blockheads are alike only in this, that neither of them thinks he is what he is."

From the "Inquiry into the various Religions of the World," we will give only the conclusion. "And what then is the result of all? This! that all religions are good—and for the places where they are—the best. They are different means to the same end. Any religion to which I cleave with conviction is the best for me. For another it is not so, because he is not convinced by it. Christianity is so little spread through the world because excellence is more rare than mediocrity. Ridicule then no religion which thou pronouncest false—thou wilt ridicule Him who suffered that religion to arise. Let us be tolerant towards those whom we may surpass in intellect, but whose hearts are perhaps better, kinder, and more loving than ours. Let us not as formerly, murder our brethren in order to please a Preserver of Life—not by stakes and inquisitions propagate a religion which is ruled by Love. How glorious are these prospects! All are our brethren—all our relations in faith—all are called to one Heaven—all loved by one Father!"

The following "Observations" from the first two books may be added to the foregoing "Inquiries."

"Many a one thinks himself pious when he calls the world a 'vale of misery.' But I think he would be more so if he called it a 'valley of joy.' God will be better pleased with him who finds everything good in the world, than with him who is content with nothing. With so many thousand joys in the world—is it not black ingratitude to call it a place of sorrow and affliction? I could the sooner forgive such an expression in a child of misfortune who in the gloomy hours of melancholy relieves his oppressed heart in lamentations, but in a fat-bellied abbot who spends his days luxuriously on the soft sofa, who knows no other burden than that of having a restless soul which interrupts the sweetness of his rest by feelings of ennui—to hear such an expression from him is insufferable, it is mocking the Creator, and repaying His kindness with ingratitude.

"Our Creator has employed every means to awaken and to nourish in us a love towards one another—the love which makes life so sweet to us, which enables us to bear each suffering with double strength. A flame burns unceasingly in our bosom, kindling joy in us when we see others joyous and filling our hearts with sadness when others weep—we call it love of mankind. I see one means thereto in that attraction in faces which we call 'beauty.' This external charm which so attracts our souls, this power which melts our hearts in melancholy and draws soft tears from our eyes, this divinity in the human face knits more firmly and closely the bond which an ever active impulse ties. O, rather would I fall down before the Maker of all that is beautiful and perfect and weep before Him, when I see a touching beauty, than cherish a voluptuous thought."

What must strike us particularly in these earliest utterances of Jean Paul, is that no trace of that quality which was afterwards so prominent in his writings, namely satiric humour, is yet to be found in them. Religious reflections, philosophical researches, observations of nature and human life, form the chief substance of his thoughts and productions, the keynote of which is love and joy. That tenderness of feeling peculiar in so high a degree to our author sought expression in a story written at this time which, with an allusion easily seen, he named "Abelard and Heloise." This novel, in the form of a series of letters, was found among his papers after his death, neatly written with his own hand and dated January 1781. The tone of the book is sufficiently shown by the motto prefixed to it: "The sensitive man is too good for this earth, on which are vain scoffers;—only in yonder world where are sympathising angels does he find the reward for his tears." The following note written on the reverse side of the title-page will tell us in what estimation he himself held the book a few months after it was written, and show also that he had already commenced the healthful practice of self-criticism.

"FAULTS: This story is wholly without plan. The plot is a complete failure; it is commonplace and uninteresting. The characters are not so much badly described as wholly undescribed. Of Abelard and Heloise one sees nothing but the hearts, none of their thoughts; none of their characteristics are painted; their love itself is not even correctly represented; besides this, the whole is exaggerated; in many passages one feels nothing just because it is meant to be exceedingly touching. It is also contrary to probability, it is very shallow, etc., etc. The language is not Goethesian, but a bad imitation of it."

“BEAUTIES: The language of the feelings is not everywhere misrepresented, the descriptions of natural scenes are not a complete failure. The German is not quite pitiable, it is not at any rate like that, which the Force-Geniuses (Kraft-Genies) of the present time write. There are also a few isolated good remarks to be found, and I should have made more, if I had striven less after sentiment. Finally this booklet has for me the beauty, that it represents a certain condition of my heart at a particular time, which I now consider as folly, because I have not the happiness to be the same fool still.”

In spite of these indications of diligence on Richter's part, his external life at this time was far from favourable to the pursuit of his studies. Shortly after their arrival in Hof in 1779, he had lost his father, who left their mother with her five children entirely destitute. Their grandparents with whom Paul was living, and on whose support his mother was entirely dependent, died soon afterwards within a short time of one another. About the heritage, itself insignificant, there arose a lawsuit among the relations, who thought themselves badly treated, and almost the whole of it was swallowed up. Richter then began first to feel the pressure of poverty and want, and it was only by his unceasing mental activity and the cheerfulness with which he resigned himself to circumstances that he preserved himself free from their fatal effects.

§. III. UNIVERSITY LIFE.—“GREENLAND LAWSUITS.” 1781—1784.

In the spring of the year 1781, Richter left the high school and went to Baireuth for his matriculation examination. A humorous description of his ride thither is given in the “Flegeljahre” (Wild oats). After passing his examination successfully, he started on the 11th May, 1781, on his journey to the University of Leipzig. Here turning to his father's profession, more because he was the eldest son of a clergyman, than from his own choice, Richter at first attended the theological lectures at Leipzig, but also at the same time in pursuance of his natural taste he attended those on philosophy and mathematics. The following extracts from his letters at this time may help to show us his impression of Leipzig and university life.

• I have arrived here safely. It is a fine town, if a town with large houses and long streets is called fine. For my part I think it monotonous. And the beautiful neighbourhood too, which you promised me, I do not find anywhere round about Leipzig. Everywhere a perpetual sameness,—no valleys and hills—wanting in all the charms which have always rendered the neighbourhood where you still live so pleasing to me. • In many respects things here are as you told me, in others they are different. I get a dinner for 18 pfennigs.* And besides this, I have got the Inscription† with Rector Clodius gratis, and the lectures too. I have only to pay 16 thalers‡ for a nice room in the Three Roses Inn in Peterstrasse No. 2, on the second floor, but this is under the condition that I turn out during Fair times. The students too are as polite and polished as you told me. But in the following matter your prophecy does not seem as if it would be realised. Private tutorships (Informazionen) are scarce here and the crowd of applicants is innumerable. In large houses those students only are taken who have recommendations. An Informazion is thus not such a common thing, and a good one is rare. I have this myself from the lips of several professors. All have told me that not very consolatory proverb of Leipzig: Lipsia vult expectari. And the expectari is so indefinite that when one has been fifty years and has not got a place after all, they still continue to say, 'He has only to wait, something will be sure to turn up!'

About twopence. † College fees: ‡ About 2l. 8s.

"Herr Kirsch* of Hof travelled with us to Leipzig. His presence has been of great assistance to me. He has recommended me most favourably to several people, and he has also written me a very good Testimonium paupertatis. I need only to show this in order to get all my lectures free."

Later he writes :

"My supposition about the expectari has not been disproved so far, it has rather been confirmed. I still have no pupils here, no table to dine at ;† no acquaintance among the students, no anything at all. It is by no means easy to get access to the professors.' Those who are really celebrated and whose favour would satisfy me, are surrounded by the amount of work and besieged by a crowd of other distinguished persons and a swarm of base flatterers, so that any one who is not recommended by his coat or his rank can only with difficulty become acquainted with them. If anyone should want to speak with a professor without having a special request to make, he would lay himself open to the suspicion of vanity. When I consider the crowd of students who deceive the professors and embitter them against the better ones, then I am able to explain to myself the whole phenomenon. But I do not on this account give up hope. I shall overcome all these difficulties—I can already do so partly, but after all, I do not need it. I come now to the mystery, the explanation of which you have so eagerly awaited, and which I only vaguely stated to my mother.

* The Rector of his school.

† Eiguen Tisch haben ; lit. to have a table, i.e. to have a free dinner. It is customary for families to invite poor students with whom they are acquainted, to dine with them on a fixed day in each week during their residence at the University.

But it is just as little solved now as then, only this I can tell you, that it has nothing to do with a Stipendium, or a Tisch, an Informazion or anything else of the kind. It concerns something of which you have no suspicion, of which I cannot tell you until the result answers my expectation. So much for that.

“Fashion is here the tyrant before whom everybody bows, though it is never consistent with itself. Dandies swarm in the streets : in fine weather they flit about like butterflies. One is as bad as the other : they are like dolls in the Marionette show, and not one has the courage to be himself. The puppy flits from lady to lady, from party to party, carries off a few follies everywhere with him, laughs and cries as the others desire, and feeds one party with the indigestible scraps which he has picked up at another ; and employs his body in eating, and his soul in doing nothing until he falls asleep. He who is not compelled by poverty to be wise, at Leipzig becomes the fool whom I have here described. Most of the rich students are like this.

“The information which you ask for, about the religious opinions in Leipzig, may be given in a few words. Almost all students lean to the side of heterodoxy. If there are not so many among them who are actually unorthodox, there are all the more who are indifferent to religion, who are naturalists or even atheists. The reason of this is probably that it is less trouble and requires less knowledge to be the latter than the former. The greater number are no longer orthodox, but only a few are Socinians in the real meaning of the word. I myself have heard a lecturer who was in orders, inveighing incessantly against the systematic mystical interpretation of the Bible, the allegory-mania, the adherence to all untrue evidence, the want of Hebrew knowledge in the interpretation of the New Testament, etc., etc. But in spite of this he does not dare freely to deny any dogma, he can only speak of the difficulties in the way of believing it and leave the decision of its value to his hearers. The chief cause which hinders freedom of thought in Saxony, is that the great men are still unenlightened. An outspoken book is at once confiscated. I am attending expository lectures on St. John by Weber; and on the Acts by Morus; on Logic and Metaphysics by Platner; on Æsthetics by the same; on Moral Philosophy by Wieland; on Geometry and Trigonometry by Gehler; on Philos's Legatio ad imperatorem Caium by Morus; and on English by M. Rogler. I have made it a rule in my studies only to follow those which I find most agreeable and for which I am the least unfitted, and which I already find useful or think will be so. I have often been led into error through following this rule but have never repented of my mistakes. Studying that for which one has no love is a struggle against weariness, tedium and disgust to attain a good which one does not desire, and this implies wasting one's powers, which feel themselves to be created for another end, on a subject with which one makes no progress and withdrawing them from that in which one would have been successful. 'But it is just by this that you earn your bread' is the pitiable objection raised in reply. I know nothing in the world by which one could not earn one's bread. I will pass over the fact that he who makes the mere gaining of necessities the sole aim of his studies—by one more by another less—never makes much progress. This being admitted, I do not know if I would earn my bread by that, for which I feel I have no capacity, in which I experience no pleasure and in which, consequently, I cannot possibly make progress, or by that, in which my pleasure spurs me on and my powers help me forward. One must live entirely for one branch of knowledge, sacrificing every power, every pleasure, every moment to it and occupying oneself with the others only in so far as they act as a foil to this one. And if by the strange complication of external circumstances I lose the paltry gain which is the object with all small intellects, this is certainly made good to me tenfold, when I enjoy that deep delight in following my object, which springs from the pursuit of truth; when I feel the charm which the expression of each of my powers has for me and when perhaps I enjoy the honour also, which sooner or later may fall to their lot. This is my defence. Hitherto I have read only philosophical works, now I prefer only witty and eloquent writings, rich in metaphor. I used not to study French, now I read French books in preference to German. The wit of a Voltaire, the eloquence of a Rousseau, the splendid style of a Helvetius, the acute remarks of a Toussaint—all these urge me to the study of the French language. I do not consider that I am learning anything, but only that I am amusing myself; yet with the impression of the beautiful passages or the witty thoughts, there remains behind also the manner in which they were expressed. I am reading Pope and am delighted with him, as also with Young. He must undoubtedly be still grander in the original. I am now learning English, primarily in order to read the excellent weekly paper, the "Spectator" of which our translation is miserable. The eloquence of Rousseau delights me, I find it again in Cicero and Seneca; these two I like above all others, and I would not give up their writings for the best of German books. Pope's satires carry me away; I found him, like Horace, more beautiful in the original. His criticism of reason is a masterpiece, as is Horace's "De Arte poetica." I now like the Latin authors and have dropped that foolish prejudice with which on very slight grounds I was infected by the bad instruction of Latin schoolmasters."

Partly through external circumstances and partly through the growth of his powers, Richter was soon guided to the choice of his calling. In addition to his regular university studies he continued the self-imposed task which he had begun at Hof. Eleven large quarto volumes of Extracts from the most recent works, went with him to Leipzig. The way he continued these private studies, strengthening thereby the foundation and framework of his whole literary power, not only indicates a thoughtfulness almost unexampled in one so young, but also evinces a physical energy which it is almost incomprehensible that his body could endure, even if his mind could sustain it. Besides diligently attending his lectures, to which he added private lessons in English, and continuing his daily exercises in writing, which filled numerous volumes, and carrying on an animated correspondence for which he had special books, writing a duplicate copy of every letter, he still found time enough not only for the most extensive reading, but also for the continuance of his ample extract books. He even commenced various new ones, "Extraits de livres français," then a succession of excerpts, "From recent works relating to Natural Philosophy and History," and others for "Theology," also a book for "Witty Ideas, Remarks, etc., from Ancient and Modern Authors;" and all these he wrote with his own hand with the greatest exactness and neatness. At the same time too, he began a dictionary of Varieties and Liberties of expression in which, under the several words and expressions, he collected and compared as many others as possible with similar meanings.

From the first-mentioned extracts, we see that he read the writings of Lessing with special zest, and among English authors those of Pope, among the French, those of Rousseau, Helvetius, Voltaire. Of the poets, he admired Shakspeare most, then Wieland, Hippel, Young, and Swift. He was not however contented with reading and copying, but soon proceeded to original compositions. Among these was (in 1781) "The Praise of Stupidity." In this piece (unprinted) Stupidity is introduced speaking; extols itself as being the foster-nurse of body and soul, the benefactress of women, dandies, potentates, courtiers, and noblemen, of theologians, philosophers, poets, etc., and concludes with an exhortation for the enlargement of her empire. The train of thought is firmer, and the expression more decided than hitherto, and the satire of the "Greenland Lawsuits" can already be traced.

At the same period or shortly afterwards, he wrote a considerable number of treatises, some shorter, some longer, mostly of a satirical nature, though some of them are also philosophical. Several are to be found in his literary remains.* Among others are "Atheism and Fanaticisms Compared;" "Stray Thoughts on Great Men;" "Full Information about the Bad, Foolish, Untrue, and Superfluous Passages which I have struck out in my still unprinted satiric Organon out of respect to good taste and the public." "The Different Points of View from which the Devil, Death and the Painter view Life."

With reference to the "Praise of Stupidity," he thus writes to Vogel:

"You probably know that I am poor; but this you probably do not know, that my poverty is not alleviated by anyone. One must first by means of money give one's patron to understand that one is in want of it, that is, one must not be poor if one wishes to become rich. This does not suit my case, and no dispenser of benefits considers me needy enough for him to give me the charities of others because I cannot give him of my own. And God has also denied me four feet whereon to crawl and gain the gracious look of a patron and a few crumbs from his abundance. I can be neither a false flatterer nor a fool of fashion, nor can I win my friends by the flexibility of my tongue or of my spine. Add to this that most of the professors have neither time nor opportunity, neither will nor means to help one; that access to them is rendered impossible through the crowd of flatterers and impostors to all those who are neither the one nor the other; that it would betray pride if one were to catch at opportunities of showing them one's best side. Put all this together, and you will know my position. But you do not yet know how I am going to better it. It occurred to me one day, 'I will write books in order to be able to buy books. I will teach the public (permit this expression for the sake of the antithesis) that I may myself be able to learn. I will make the end the means, and harness the horses behind the cart to get out of this horrid pass. I then made an alteration in the nature of my studies; I read good authors—Seneca, Ovid, Pope, Swift, Young, Voltaire, Rousseau, Boileau, and I know not whom else. Erasmus' Encomium Moriae suggested to me the idea of praising stupidity. I began, I improved, I found difficulties where I did not expect, and found none where I awaited them, and I finished on the day on which I received your valuable letter. You will think 'Strange' if you do not think 'Foolish.'"

* Jean Paul's Sämmtliche Werke, 1st ed. vols. lxii. & xlv.

"The Praise of Stupidity," as already mentioned, did not reach its goal, the press. But Richter did not suffer himself to be discouraged by this, and soon produced the "Greenland Lawsuits," which was published anonymously at Berlin in 1783.

It contained satires on Authors, Theologians, on the Pride of Birth, on Women and Dandies, etc., which without doubt he adorned with an abundance of wit and metaphor, but to which with his very limited knowledge of the world, drawn mostly from books, he could supply only an incomplete foundation of reality. The bitterness of tone in which the book is written is very striking. According to his own confession not one line of love is to be found in the whole of the two volumes.

But what concerns us most in it is the free and liberal spirit displayed throughout. The author places himself with decision on the liberal side, and appears as the declared adversary of blind faith in theological matters, of the prerogative of birth, the surveillance of the press, and the many evils arising therefrom. That in personal matters too he was able to have and maintain his own opinions, is shown by the pigtail episode, which in a few words is as follows:

For reasons of his own Richter chose to dispense with the discomfort and expense of collar and cravat, as also of the queue which according to the fashion of that time was indispensable. Society considered the matter of so much importance that it appears to have allowed him little peace at Leipzig or among his friends at Hof. So irate was a certain Magister at Leipzig, a fellow lodger in the house with Richter, at having to walk in the same garden with the queueless student that he prevailed on the landlord to relieve him of the nuisance. In spite of remonstrance from friends and enemies Richter held firm to his fancy for seven years. "I hold," said he, "the constant regard that we pay in all actions to the judgments of others as the poison of our peace, our reason and our virtue. At this slave-chain I have long filed, but I scarcely hope ever to break it." The following circular addressed to his friends and the public was a fitting end of this characteristic episode:

"The Undersigned begs to announce publicly that, whereas short hair has as many enemies as red, whereas said enemies are at the same time enemies of the person on whom the hair grows; and further, whereas such a fashion is in no respect Christian, for were it so Christian people would adopt it, and whereas moreover the Undersigned has suffered as much injury from his hair as Absalom from his, though from opposite reasons; and whereas he has been privately informed that people have endeavoured to bring him to his grave, because there the hair would grow without scissors, he here makes known that he will not willingly wait so long. It is hereby announced therefore to a gracious and highborn public, that the Undersigned purposes on Sunday next to appear in several of the important streets of Hof, with a short pigtail of false hair, and with this pigtail, as with a magnet and cord of love and magic wand, to obtain by force the love of every one let his name be what it will.

“J. P. F. R.”

But to return to Leipzig. Though the “Greenland Lawsuits” had found a publisher, it did not meet with a warm reception from the public; and his expectations raised so high had now gradually to lower their pitch until, little by little, they completely died away. We find him however busy with a new book, and that again a satirical one, the “Selections from the Devil’s Papers,” but his life now at Leipzig was fast becoming unendurable. Even the hope of becoming known by his book and of forming connexions with men of name and note had deceived him. Direct offers to booksellers, attempts at mediation through others had all miscarried entirely. For a long time he had not received anything from home and had even grieved his good mother, who always hoped that he would go into the Church, in being unable to do anything to help her; assistance from his friends could not be asked to an unlimited extent, and he was now reduced to the choice between debts and hunger. One evening, accompanied by a friend, he went at dusk to the town-gate to await the stage-coach, which took him back to Hof, and thus in November 1784 brought his university career to an end.

“A gladdening and enchanting time was that of my youth and one to which I ever look back with yearning, though not the external life, the barrenest that a youth ever endured, but the internal which bore a complete spring-time with blossoms and flowers under the deep snow of the external.”

§ IV. TUTORSHIP.—“THE INVISIBLE LODGE.” 1784—1792.

Poverty had driven Richter from Leipzig and poverty awaited him in Hof. There, in a little room with his mother and younger brothers, he continued his work amid a variety of annoyances and privations. But those things which would have reduced another to despair—the washing and scouring, the cooking, the ironing, and the continual buzzing of the spinning-wheel, by the aid of which his mother gained their scanty livelihood—to him these all became materials for poetry and study, with which he afterwards characterised the “Good Lenette;” and the privations through which they passed, whether serious or comic, he hoarded up for “Siebenkäs,” his Advocate of the Poor. Like him, Richter was employed while under the pressure of wants from all sides in elaborating his “Devil’s Papers.” With this work when complete he applied to several publishers, but in vain: and after numerous other equally fruitless efforts to obtain literary work of any kind, he was at length glad to accept the first offer which promised him freedom from absolute want. This came from the father of one of his friends named von Oertel, who asked him to come to Tübingen, and undertake the instruction of his youngest son.

With the new year of 1787, Richter entered on his office with hopes of better times than he had hitherto enjoyed. But though he may well have breathed freely on quitting Hof, it was no paradise to which he came. Herr von Oertel was far from being a genial man, nor did Richter ever succeed in gaining the confidence or affection of his pupil. He felt too the want of his Hof friends, since there was hardly anyone at Töpen with whom he could associate; and he missed the library of his old friend Vogel. Had it not been for the kindness of the Frau von Oertel, which he always remembered with gratitude, his new life would hardly have been more endurable than the old.

In May of this year, Richter at length succeeded in getting a publisher for the "Devil's Papers," but the honorarium which he received was a mere nothing, and the book seems to have been carelessly and badly printed and remained unnoticed.

After the lapse of two years his engagement at Töpen came to an end, in what seems to have been not quite a friendly manner, and he returned to his mother at Hof in the summer of 1789. Necessity, however, forced him again to accept the office of tutor. Seven children of both sexes and diverse ages and abilities were intrusted to his care, and we now see the author of the "Invisible Lodge" as the teacher of the multiplication table and the rudiments of grammar. At the same time, however, we may see him sketching the outline of his "Levana," while bringing these young plants to a fruitful maturity.

His energy and activity at this time are truly astonishing. Besides instructing these seven children in elementary knowledge of all kinds, and superintending their work out of school hours which at times was no easy task—one of the boys once did a voluntary composition of 135 pages—he still found time and strength for his own development. He continued reading the most important and, as far as possible, the most recent works of all kinds, and, in accordance with his usual custom, made copious extracts from them in his note-books. Of these note books, to which there seems to be no end, he now began several fresh ones, on all kinds of subjects—philosophical, historical, æsthetical, geographical, satirical, humorous, etc. By this means he kept himself in constant practice in writing; but these books do not appear to have had any further use, for he seldom or never referred to them afterwards in composing his works.

In June 1790, he sent Otto a list of thirty-two subjects which he intended to work up. Most of them were finished in the course of this and the following year. We here give a few to show of what kind they were.

“Description of the Public and Private Libraries” (comic appendix to “Titan”). “Devilocracy, instead of Theocracy” (unprinted). “Critique of the Opera of the holy Kingdomcome.” “That Women are our Popes” (“Invisible Lodge”). “Grimaces” (unprinted). “Lawcourts of Love.” “Description of my Epitaph” (unprinted). “Female Fainting Fits” (“Invisible Lodge”).

In the same year, 1790, he also wrote the “Bavarian Kreuzer Comedy,” which strangely enough remained unprinted, and eventually found place in “The Paper Kite,” Frankfort, 1845. But it must not be supposed that he wrote his works off-hand. For the smallest of them he kept special books, and carefully worked out the plans, characters, and descriptions beforehand, so that each separate work occupied at least as much time in preparation as in execution.

When we see that with all these many and various occupations Richter found time to keep a written account in his diary of his daily life, and to enter with his own hand all his letters in a correspondence book; it is difficult to imagine where his material life, with its necessities, can have found a place.

His productions still met with no success, but in spite of all difficulties he worked on with obstinate perseverance and in February 1792, after eleven months' labour, he completed his first novel, the "Invisible Lodge." This he sent to one Moritz, at Berlin, in whose work, "Anton Reisser," he had recognised a kindred spirit, with a letter, from which the following is an extract :—

"I would that you had already read this sheet, that I might not blush under your astonishment on seeing this volume. The black oilskin contains, like life, a man's character, his joys and griefs; a half-broken plan; in short a novel—I had almost written a man. 'Why,' I ask myself, 'dost thou send a German novel—for this species of literary spawn, begotten by generatio æquivoca, is repulsive to a man of taste—to one whom thou lovest; who has so often made thee sad by showing thee what life is, and what man, who casts his leaves therein, what the pointed moment of time is on which we stand; and how a world lies between our short sleep and dream, and a little earth between those who are sleeping and dreaming somewhat longer.' One is sad when one finishes a book, for one thinks of all other things which one will finish—I am not now in good enough spirits to be clear.

"As I send you the book, I should in vain endeavour to hide from you the opinion which I have of it, and which has not allowed me to put it in circulation, like a defaced Louis d'or, on the book exchange and to offer it to the unfeeling touch of intellectual slave-dealers, who are unknown to me. It is sweet to me to know that I send it to a heart which—excepting its superiority—is like the one under which it has been born and nourished. If after reading it you should think it worthy to be read by the few who are like you, I beg you, either through your opinion, or by a few pages or the whole, to procure for it a commercial hand who will conduct it from the written into the printed world.

“J. P. F. R.”

After so many vain attempts, Richter's hopes for the success of this despatch were not very high; and the greater, therefore, was his surprise when Moritz at once wrote, heartily congratulating him on his work and desiring to make the acquaintance of the author without delay. A publisher was found in Matzdorff, the brother-in-law of Moritz, and Richter before long had the gratification of laying a sum of 100 ducats in the lap of his poor and much astonished mother.

END OF THE TUTORSHIP.—WEIMAR.—ILLNESS.—DEATH.
1792--1824.

In the autumn of 1792 Jean Paul began his second important work, the “Hesperus.” He still, however, retained his post as tutor until the spring of 1794, when the eldest of his pupils entered the high school at Baireuth, and he returned to his mother's little room at Hof. To make the life of this good woman happier, was now his first object.

With the “Invisible Lodge” he had entered on his proper path. For though he could not entirely renounce either jesting or sarcasm, he never again wrote a book wholly of satires like the “Devil's Paper” or the “Greenland Lawsuits.” A number of fresh projects now arose in his mind, to all of which he made a beginning. The “Hesperus,” begun in September 1792, was finished in June 1794. “Siebenkäs” was commenced in the meantime, and the groundwork to “Titan” was also laid. “Quintus Fixlein,” with its jocular and touching appendices was now written and at the end of a year it passed into a second edition together with the “History of its Prefaces," and the "Annihilation." At the same time too appeared the "Biographical Diversions."

His rising fame brought him many invitations to visit Weimar, the centre of German literature and when, in June 1796, he made a journey thither, he appears to have been welcomed with enthusiasm. He there became personally acquainted with Herder, Knebel, Einsiedel and Frau von Kalb. Wieland who at that time was absent in Switzerland wrote to express his pleasure in the prospect of making Richter's acquaintance. By Schiller and Goethe, who had already expressed unfavourable opinions about his writings, he was not so cordially welcomed, but his presence seems so far to have had an effect, that Goethe declared himself, "favourably disposed towards him on account of his love of truth and desire of improvement," while Schiller not only invited him to become a contributor to the "Horen," but even wished him to settle down permanently at Jena. He also became acquainted with the Duchess Amalie, at whose castle at Tieffurth near Weimar he was a frequent visitor.

His increasing fame and the appreciation which he met with wherever he went, began to make him dissatisfied with the limited life in the village of Hof, and on the death of his mother which occurred at this time, he removed to Leipzig. He did not however remain there long, and in 1798 removed to Weimar. Here, through the influence of Jacobi and Herder whose "Metakritik" he read over with him in manuscript, his interest in philosophy was again roused. The negative doctrines of Kant and the idealism of Fichte found no favour with him. His nature demanded a belief in God, and a faith in the immortality of the soul, and he appears to have had a much greater sympathy with Herder and Jacobi. In the Letters to his future son Hans Paul he opposed the critical school with much philosophical acuteness and also with his own peculiar weapons of humour and satire; against Fichte he directed his "Clavis Fichtina."

While at Weimar he appears to have been a frequent visitor at the court of Hildburghausen. "Imagine," he writes to Otto, "the angelic duchess with her beautiful childlike eyes, her whole face filled with love and youth and grace, with a nightingale's voice and a mother's heart, then her sister, the Princess of Solms, still more beautiful and just as good, and the third, the Princess of Thurn and Taxis, both of whom arrived with their healthy, happy children the same day as I did. These people love me and read my books most heartily and wish only that I would remain another week, to see the fourth noble and beautiful sister, the Queen of Prussia. I am always invited to dinner and supper. Yesterday I improvised on the piano before the court."

One result of the visit to Hildburghausen was that the Duke conferred on him the title and privileges of a Legationsrath (Councillor of Legation), and another that he dedicated his "Titan," upon which he was now engaged, to the "four sisters upon the throne," and a third that he became engaged to one of the court ladies, Fräulein Caroline von Feuchtersleben. This engagement however, like a former one, appears to have been amicably broken off, both parties recognising that the difference in their positions and lives threw difficulties in the way of their union.

It was in the following year, when in Berlin, that he met the lady who was to be his wife. This was Caroline, the second daughter of the Obertribunalrath Maier. Their marriage was celebrated in May 1801.

While at Meiningen where they first settled, and afterwards at Coburg, Richter devoted himself diligently to reading and working. The six volumes of the "Titan," of which two had already appeared, were completed. Between the second and third he wrote a few smaller works. "The secret Complaint of Men of the present Time," and "Strange Company on New Year's Night," and also the second comic appendix to "Titan." About this time too he was working at the "Wildoats" which he at first intended to publish with the title "History of my Brother," and the "Death in the other World." Requests from all sides for small contributions for albums and periodicals threatened to overwhelm him; however much he might desire to withstand these, he could not return a negative to all the demands, and we owe many valuable essays to these applications. In February 1802, he wrote to Otto that, after the "Wildoats," he would finish the "Biographical Diversions," and then write "Siebenkäs' Marriage with Natalie," and after that nothing but critical and philosophical works. The "Biographical Diversions" was intended as a companion novel to "Titan," and Richter made preparations for it with this intention; for "Siebenkäs' Second Marriage" also the plan and many studies still exist, but neither of these works was completed, though many a humorous and elevating work followed besides the critical and philosophical ones.

While at Coburg, Jean Paul suffered a severe loss in the death of Herder. To his grief for his friend is probably due the change which we notice at this time in his writings. The "Wildoats," which he had been working at with great pleasure, was now laid aside, and with it all imaginative writing. He turned to the "Introduction to Æsthetics," and after the completion of that, commenced preparations for the "Levana." In 1804 he removed to Baireuth, where he devoted himself, if possible, with more energy than ever to his work. After the completion of the "Levana," we find him next writing on political subjects.

His admiration for Napoleon's greatness struggled for some time with his patriotism. For humanity he would have sacrificed his nationality; but when the conqueror showed himself the enemy of both, Richter no longer hesitated on which side to place himself. But he sympathised as little in the dirge of the despondent as in the cry of hatred against the enemy, and least of all did he share in the fear of Germany's annihilation. Hope seems to have been the keynote of his compositions, and in the midst of the din of war he cheered his countrymen with "The Chicken-hearted Attila Schmelzle," "Fibel the Coxcomb," and "The Droll Cynic Katzenberger." While with the more serious "Twilight" and the "Peace" and "Lent Sermons" he warned, admonished and soothed them.

The following letter to Otto in May 1808 gives one a glimpse of his feelings and opinions at this time:

"My heart is now rigid, barren and cold. The spring with all its starry heavens is nothing to me. I shall remain rigid and cold until the great world-game has been won. This however does not withhold me—it spurs me on—from working zealously with my individual powers for the general good. Let him whom the time strikes down, first raise himself again, and then it with him. If the plurality of devils has some power, that of angels has still more. Still more, I say, for human nature gives ten angels the balance against one hundred devils. . . . If this were not so, humanity instead of rising would long since have sunk under the preponderance of the weak, the stupid and the bad."

While his opinions strengthened the love of many of his old friends and also gained him many new ones, they did not fail, on the other hand, to estrange many from him. Among these latter was the Duke Emil August of Gotha, who had formerly been one of his great admirers. The loss of his favour, however, was compensated for by the friendship of another German Prince, namely, Carl von Dalberg, Prince of Primas. He was the first who remembered the princely privilege of showing gratitude in the name of his people to their benefactor, and not content with admiring Richter's genius and praising his powers, he thought also of the conditions necessary for the development of these powers and granted him a yearly pension of 1000 guldens. Such assistance was the more welcome as the King of Prussia had withdrawn a promise, given some years before, that he would grant him a prebendary.

The "Autumn Flowers," published in 1810, is a collection of essays and short pieces on political and other subjects, which had first appeared in magazines and which he now collected into a volume. Two years later, after the termination of the war, he commenced "Nicolaus Margraf" (The Comet), a comic novel. He appears to have made more extensive preparations for this than for any other of his books, and worked at it with much pleasure. "I am now boiling and roasting over a large comic work," he writes in July 1813. "But in it I have vowed I will not again do as I have done hitherto, for in all my comic works, like a child born ball-shape and straightway crucified on a pillow, I have yielded to the strict rules of art, and have, alas! been only too proper; now I will give myself the reins and go where I will—up, down, in flights and springs—with real boldness. My friend, I will retrieve and postscript my youth in age."

Too much work and anxiety began about this time to tell on Richter's robust health, and we find him making frequent little tours for the sake of change of scene. On one of these trips in 1812, he met with F. H. Jacobi in Nürnberg, with whom he had long corresponded but not met personally. Four years later, when visiting Regensburg, he made the acquaintance of Prince Primas Carl von Dalberg, whom we have already mentioned. With him Richter seems to have been on good terms. He writes to Otto, "I have never in so short a time become one-eighth part so fond of a prince. Of an evening we often sit until dusk before the half-emptied bottle, and talk of religion, philosophy and scientific topics of all kinds." The following year (1817), Richter visited Heidelberg, where he made the acquaintance of such men as Voss, Paulus, Hegel, Schwarz. He here received his doctor's degree, and was fêted by professors and students as he had never been before. To his wife he writes, "I have passed hours here such as I have never experienced under the brightest heaven of my life, in particular the water-party, the students' Vivats and the songs from the old Italian music, but I thank the Allgood as well as I can by gentleness, modesty, love and justice to all." The piece called "The Evergreen of our Feelings" which is a memorial of this visit, was written soon after his return home. Besides new editions of some of his other works, he now at the request of his friends began the Autobiography, for which however he appears to have had no zest. In 1818 he wrote to Voss, "At present I am writing my life, though I would rather write that of any one else, yet I must do it for no one knows my inner life but God and the devil; the form however of the Biography will be different from that of all former ones." And again, "I have little pleasure in the Biography because there is no scope for imagination in it, and I have never even in novels liked to let the bare history flow on without the two banks of jest and feeling, and also because I care for no one less than myself. I wish I could relate my life to you, and you could put it in proper shape; but I doubt not I shall find or make the right vehicle for it." In this frame of mind he attempted to weave his life into the story, "Nicolaus Margraf," already mentioned, which he was now writing, or to bring it in some other way in connexion with the store of thoughts and ideas which he had hoarded in his brain. But the work does not appear to have become less distasteful, and he laid it aside before he had proceeded far and devoted himself with more energy to the "Comet."

We now fast approach the end. In 1821, he received a blow from which he never recovered, in the death of his son Max, a promising young man, who died while at the university, of a nervous fever brought on by overwork, and aggravated by a despondent state of mind induced by the study of philosophy. After his son's death, Richter appears to have lost his taste for satirical humorous writing. The Autobiography and "Comet" were laid aside and he began immediately the "Selina," a work on the immortality of the soul, which however he did not live to finish. In the spring following his son's death while he was staying at Dresden whither he had gone to recruit his health, he found that he was fast losing the sight of one of his eyes. Doctors and opticians were unable to help him, and symptoms of dropsy which showed themselves necessitated a course of treatment which increased the malady in his eyes. The last weeks of his life were spent with his nephew, Otto Spazier, in revising his works for a complete edition. He does not appear to have thought that his end was so near, and looked forward with much pleasure to completing the work he had already begun. But towards the last his strength failed him rapidly, and on the 14th of November, 1824, his spirit found its rest.

JEAN PAUL FRIEDRICH RICHTER.

—————

AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

FIRST LECTURE.

WONSIEDEL—BIRTH—GRANDFATHER.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—It was in the year 1763, on February 15th, that the peace of Hubertsburg came to this world, and after it the present Professor of the history of himself; and this in the month in which the yellow and grey wagtails, the redbreasts, the cranes, and other snipes and waders, arrived with him, namely, in the month of March,—and this, too, on that day of the month on which the spoonwort and the trembling poplar the speedwell and the henbit, just come opportunely into blossom for anyone who may wish to strew flowers on the cradle, namely, on the 21st of March,—and this, too, in the earliest, freshest time of day, namely, at 1.30 A.M.; but what crowns all, is, that the beginning of his life was at the same time the beginning of that Spring.

This last idea, that I, the Professor, and the Spring were born together, has been introduced by me in conversation, I suppose, a hundred times already; but I intentionally discharge it here, like a cannon-shot, for the 101st time, in order that by the discharge I may be incapacitated from offering again as a bonmot-bonbon that which has already been handed round to the whole world through the printer's devil. It is a misfortune when Fate herself has laid a pun, like a nest-egg, in the history of anyone, be he the wittiest of men, and let him hatch new ideas by bushels; for on this egg he sits and broods a whole lifetime, in hopes of hatching something. For instance, I once knew a barber and a coachman, both of whom, on being asked what they were called, invariably answered, neither differently, nor more simply or less wittily, than, Ihr gehorsamer Diener (Your humble servant); or else, Ihr Diener Diener (Your servant Diener); now the cause was that each had the misfortune to be called Diener (servant), and thus the indelible mark (character indebilis) of a standard joke was, as it were, tinselled on their heads, or they were both condemned to one perpetual idea; the trade wind of their wit blew continually in one direction. And still less, my honoured friends, let us hope to surprise a man who bears a name, common and proper at the same time, such as Ochs (Ox) and Rapinat (Plunder) both formerly in Switzerland—Wolf—Schlegel (Mallet)—Richter (judge)—to surprise, I say, such a double-named man with a pun, be it ever so brilliant; for he has lived long enough with his name for any pun to be quite stale to him, which, to his new acquaintance, appears new, fresh and witty. Müllner, now, was more successful with his pun on Schotten (Scotchmen) and Schatten (shadows); for no Schotten ever considered themselves Schatten, and no Schatten Schatten: they are eternally separated by two vowels.

I return to my story, and find myself among the dead; for all are now out of the world who saw my entrance into it. My father, Johann Christian Christoph Richter, was *Terzius and organist in Wonsiedel; my mother, Sophia Rosina, was the daughter of a cloth-weaver, Johann Paul Kuhn, in Hof. On the day following my birth, I was baptized by the senior Apel. One godfather was the above-mentioned Johann Paul; the other was Johann Friedrich Thieme, a bookbinder, who did not know at that time on what a Mæcenas of his handicraft he bestowed his name; from these two sprang the compound name Johann Paul Friedrich, the grandfather's half of which, I translated into French, and thus made of it one complete name—Jean

* To understand this title and others occurring afterwards, the reader must know that a German gymnasium, or high school, has eight masters—the Rector, or headmaster, Conrektor, Subrektor, Quintus, Quartus, Tertius, Secundus, Primus. The classes are arranged in the inverse order; the first class, or Prima, being the highest. Boys in the Prima are called Primaners, in the Secunda Secundansers, and so on.—Tr.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

Paul, for reasons which will be fully explained in later lectures of this winter season.

But for the present we will let the hero and subject of these historical lectures lie unheeded in the cradle and on the mother's breast, and sleep long enough—from the long morning-sleep of life there is little of general historical interest to be learned—sleep long enough for me to speak, if only shortly and insufficiently, of those towards whom my heart inclines itself and my pen—of my relations, my father, mother, and grandparents.

My father was the son of the Rector,* Johann Richter, in Neustadt at Culm. Little is known of him except that he was poor and pious in the highest degree. When either of his surviving grandchildren goes to Neustadt, he is still received with grateful love and joy by the inhabitants; the old ones tell how conscientious and strict were his life and his tuition, and yet how cheerful. A little bench behind the organ is still shown where he knelt every Sunday in prayer, and a cave, too, made by himself in the so-called Culm, wherein to pray, which still remained until the time when his fiery son—although only for him too fiery—played with the Muses and Penia.

The evening twilight was a daily autumn to him, in which pacing up and down the scantily furnished school-room, he would reap the harvest of the day and prayerfully think over the sowing for the morrow. His school-house was a prison, not with bread-and-water, but with bread-and-beer fare; more than this—with perhaps a little pious contentment thrown in—was not allowed by a rectorate, though united with the offices of Cantor† and Organist: for, in spite of this lion-society of three offices, it did not yield more than 150 guildens per annum. At this hunger-well, not uncommon for Baireuth schoolmen, stood the man who had formerly been Cantor at Rehau, for five-and-thirty long years,—and drew. He might assuredly have got a few more scraps and halfpennies if he had been promoted, say, to the post of country clergyman. Whenever the schoolmasters change their clothes—when they exchange the school-gown for the priest's gown,—they receive better victuals, just as the silkworms, at each fresh skinning, get better food ; and in this manner such a man, by increase of his work, may increase his income to such an extent, that he may come up with those state officials with their pensions and gratuities, whose five-note lines of prizes are carried through the complete score of the cabinet, in spite of all pauses of the instrument.

* See note above.

† The leader of the choir.—Tr.

When my grandfather called on the boys' parents, which he did occasionally, more for the pupils' than the parents' sake, he would take of the above-mentioned beer and bread, at which he remained all his life, a piece of the latter in his pocket, and expect only a tankard of beer from his host. At length, in the year 1763—just the year of my birth—it fell out that he was elected, probably through special connexions with some Higher Powers, to an important position, one for which the rectorate, the town, and the Culmberg were very readily given up. He was exactly seventy-six years four months and eight days of age when he actually received the said place in the Neustadt—graveyard ; his wife had already gone twenty years before to her place beside him. My parents were called with me to his death-bed when I was a child of five months old.

He was dying, when a clergyman (as my father has often told me) said to my parents : " Let the old Jacob lay his hand on the child's head and bless him ;" and thus I was put on his death-bed, and he laid his hand on my head. O pious grandfather ! Often have I thought of thy hand blessing me while already growing cold in death, when fate has led me out of dark hours into brighter ; and I can, too, hold firm to my belief in thy blessing in a world permeated and animated by Miracles and Spirits.

My father was born in Neustadt on the 16th of December, 1727—born, I might say, rather for the winter of life than, like me, for a spring, had not his vigorous nature been able to carve a safe haven for him even among the icebergs. He could only afford to enjoy, or rather endure, the Lyceum at Wonsiedel, as Luther did his school in Eisenach, as a so-called Alumnus (poor scholar) ; for when a yearly income of 150 guldens had to be divided between father, mother, and several sisters, nothing at all, or at best only Alumnus-bread, could fall to his share. Later he entered the Gymnasium poeticum at Regensburg in order, not only to hunger in a larger town, but also to cultivate the real blossom of his nature instead of the leaves,—which blossom was music. In the chapel of the Prince of Thurn and Taxis—the well-known connoisseur and patron of music—he could do homage to the saint for whose service he was born; and twenty years later he became a favourite composer of church music in the principality of Bairuth. On the eve of Good Friday he would perform, to the delight of us children as well as of himself, the heilige Allmacht, with which the Catholics edified and purified their souls at that time. To my grief, I must confess that when some years ago I was in Regensburg, amongst all its antiquities and remembrances—not excepting even the Imperial Diet—my father's hard life was the most important of all to me; and often in the palace of Thurn and Taxis, and in the narrow streets, where a couple of stout fellows would have hard work to get by each other, I have thought of the confined ways and narrow paths of his youthful days.

Later, at Jena and Erlangen, he studied, not music, but theology, perhaps merely for the sake of worrying himself for a time, namely, until his thirty-second year, as a private tutor at Bairuth, in which town his son has collected the whole of this information. For by the year 1760 he had already wrested from the state the post of Organist and Terzius in the town of Wonsiedel, and thus in this matter had more and earlier good-luck, under the Markgraf of Bairuth, than that candidate in Hanover (of whom we read), who, being seventy years old, received no other position in the church than the one close by in the churchyard.

But now, I pray, let not any of my audience fear, from what has been already said, that they are going to be introduced to a pitiable object of a father, who, like many a modern hypocrite, goes about swaddled in tear-soaked handkerchiefs; he lived on wings, and was sought in the families of Brandenburg, and Schöpf as the pleasantest and most amusing companion. This power of social humour accompanied him throughout his life, though in his ministerial duties he was known as one of the strictest of divines, and in the pulpit as a so-called law-preacher. He won the hearts of his relations in his native town by his enthusiastic sermons, and in Hof in the Voigtland he won something still more important—a bride, and, what was yet more difficult, her rich parents into the bargain. When a citizen, who has become wealthy by cloth-making and veil-selling, does not refuse the prettiest, and most loved of his two delicately nurtured daughters to a needy Terzjus, who, together with his creditors, lives within a day's journey of him,—then, I say, this Terzjus on the one hand can only have overcome daughter and parents by much merit of his personal attractions, and by the fame and impressiveness of his great pulpit gifts; and on the other hand there must have dwelt in the cloth-weaver a soul above his cloth and money, for which talent and clerical worth shone with more lustre than did the glittering silver of an ordinary being. On the 13th of October, 1761, the beloved went as bride with her treasures to the cramped little school-house, which luckily was not made any smaller by house-furniture. His cheerful disposition, his indifference to money, united with his confidence in his housekeeper, left abundance of superfluous empty room in the Terzjus couch-shell for all moveable possessions from Hof which might wish to take up their abode with him; but my mother—in those days married people were so, and a few are still—minded the bareness throughout her married life as little as my father himself did. The strong man should have courage to wed either the rich landowner, or, just as well, the poor housekeeper.

In my historical lectures, I warn you, hunger will occur with ever-increasing power—in the case of the hero it reaches a very high pitch—and as often, I daresay, as the feasting in Thümmel's "Travels," and the tea-drinking in Richardson's "Clarissa;" yet I cannot help saying to poverty, "Be welcome! provided only that thou comest not quite too late in life." Riches fetter talent more than poverty: many an intellectual giant may lie stifled under thrones and golden mountains. When the oil of wealth is poured on the flames of youth, and especially of the more ardent, stronger youth, then will little more be left of the Phoenix than the ashes; only a Goethe has the power to keep his Phoenix wings unsinged in the sun of prosperity. The poor historical Professor would not, for much money, have had much money in his youth. Fate does with poets, as we do with birds—it darkens the warbler's cage until he has caught the oft-played air that he is to sing.

But spare, O just Fate, the old man from want, for he it is who ought not—must not—be without. The heavy years have bent his back too much already, he can no more erect himself as the youth, and carry his burdens lightly on his head. The old man, while still on the earth, already needs the rest within it; of the world he can use only the present and but little future, for now he has no more the planting, blooming future as foil for his present. Two steps from the last and lowest bed, with no other curtains than the flowers, he wishes still to rest and to slumber a little in the old grandfather's chair; and, half asleep, to open his eyes once more, and gaze on the old stars and meadows of youth. And I have little objection—for he has done the most important part for the next as well as this world—if, in the evening, he looks forward to his breakfast next morning, and in the morning to his bed, and if the world lets him depart, in his second childhood, amid those harmless pleasures of the senses, with which she received him in his first.

Only one single error on my father's part may be laid to the charge of poverty, namely, that he sacrificed himself like a monk to his ministerial office, instead of devoting himself with his whole musical soul to the tone-muse; that he suffered his genius to be buried in a village church. The Church-ship was in those days, it is true—particularly in the opinion of Bürger parents-in-law—the Provision-ship or Air-ship, and the needy son of music strove to run into the haven of the pulpit. But whoever feels in himself a declination and inclination of his magnet-needle, not urged on him by wants or education, but growing up with him, let him follow its pointing with confidence, as that of a compass through the desert. Had the present Professor of history imitated his father, as the latter wished, he now, instead of giving these lectures, would be delivering sacred official discourses and speeches, both casual and otherwise; and would probably be enrolled in the universal "Magazine for Preachers," only, alas, to swell it more immoderately.

But my father was not in reality unfaithful either to himself or his muse; for did she not visit him, as his old love, in the cloister attire of the Blessed Virgin, bringing him the church music every week to the lonely, toneless parish of Joditz? And, on the other hand, there dwelt in him also another power besides his musical talent, which sought play-room in the pulpit; for although, as the old saying tells us, great musicians are generally given to the sensual pleasure of drinking, and, as Lavater says, to that of eating, and in this way the Kapellmeister* may appear as his own collar-master and steward, yet one does not hear that they were particularly good pulpit orators in addition to this. Eloquence, the prosaic wall-and-door neighbour to poetry, dwelt in my father's ministerial heart; and the same sunbeams of genius, which in the morning of his life awakened melodious strains, as in a Memnon's statue, united afterwards in the pulpit a genial light with the thunder of the law.

I am quite aware, my friends, that I am talking a long time of my relations and praising them highly; but I will immediately begin, I assure you, to speak of myself, and then I shall with difficulty stop again. This very praise which I bestow on my father would appear to him, if he was still living, just as important as it appears vain to me, when I picture him to myself in Eternity, where he will not be particularly proud, amongst the blessed, that in the year 1818 he was again announced from my lecturing chair as a composer of church music in the principality of Baireuth—and just this and a similar coldness must my son expect of me, if ever on some future day, after I have become a spirit, he shall eagerly tell to the world the universal applause which my works have won,—but let him on this account paint them, as little as I have done, either more coldly or more shortly.

The fact is, most honoured sirs, I would ten times rather give you historical lectures on my forefathers than on myself. What a different form does the past take, which otherwise were so unfamiliar to us, when our relations pass through it and link it in brotherly alliance with our present! That man is to be envied whose history accompanies him back from his forefathers to their forefathers, and thus colours a grey time with green. For we cannot paint the times in which our grandparents and great-grandparents lived, even when they themselves were old, otherwise than in the brightness and freshness of youth; just as in reality we compose our future world of old men and not of youths.

* The Kapellmeister, or Capellmeister, is the director of the royal orchestral band.

I return at length to the hero and subject of our lectures, and call particular attention to the fact that I was born in Wonsiedel (wrongly called Wunsiedel), a town on the Fichtelgebirge. The Fichtelgebirge, one of the highest regions of Germany, gives health to its inhabitants (they would be the first to dispense with the Alexanderbad), and strong, tall figures; and the Professor leaves it to his audience to decide whether he appears in his chair of office as a confirmation of, or an exception to this. It is vexatious, I may add, for a man who would best like to make himself a name in his native town, that the Wonsiedlers swallow the r at the beginning and end of the words with which, as every one knows, the name "Richter" must commence and finish. The ancestors of the Wonsiedlers, moreover, have been crowned from all times with laurel wreaths for their bravery in war, which is what I must wish for them as my village ancestors; and from history* it is sufficiently well known how they withstood and defeated the Hussites; and if for "Hussites" we put "critics," anyone who will count my victories over the enemies from Hussite Nikolai to Hussite Merkel, will perhaps think that the race has not degenerated in bravery.

In Wonsiedel, the sixth town of the six so-called Confederate States, there was always, at any rate for Patriotism and for societies for help and justice, a sixth creation day, and German love, fidelity, and strength took up their abode there. I am glad to have been born in thee, thou little town under the long and lofty mountain-range,

* According to the detailed account of the Fichtel-berg (Leipzig, 1716), p. 52, the Hussites had laid waste the whole of the land above the mountain range; but on the Friday before Pentecost the Wonsiedlers repulsed 18,000 of the Bohemians, who had stormed their town three times:

whose tops look down on us like eagle-heads. Thou hast adorned thy mountain throne by the steps thereto, and thy healing spring gives strength—not to thee—but to the sick, to climb to the canopy above him and to the command of the distant villages and plains. I am glad to have been born in thee, thou little but good and bright town.

It has often been remarked that the first-born are generally of the female sex. To this observation the subject of our history is no exception, in spite of his right of primogeniture; for as his parents were married in October, 1761, and he was born in March, 1763, another little being (as he has heard), for this world only a shadow, had gone before him and began its existence in the light of another world, perhaps without having seen the light of this one.

The far-reaching memories of childhood bring joy to the tottering man, striving in this wave-existence to get a firm hold anywhere; yes, they elevate him more than one can say—much more than the memories of his later and more busy life; and this perhaps for these two reasons,—firstly, that he thinks, by thus looking back, to force his way nearer to the gates of life guarded by spirits and darkness; and, secondly, he hopes in the mental power of early consciousness to find, as it were, an independence of this contemptible little mortal body. I am glad that I am still able to recall a dim, faint recollection of the time when I was twelve or at most fourteen months old, like the first mental snowdrop out of the dark soil of childhood. I still remember that one of the poor scholars was very fond of me, and that he used always to carry me about in his arms—which is more pleasant than being carried on the hands* in later life—and used to give me milk to drink in the large gloomy room of the Alumni. His distant fading picture and his love for me hovered over many years. Now alas! I know his name no more; but yet it is possible that he is still living, far on towards his seventieth year, and the wide-read scholar may meet with these lectures, and may then call to mind a little Professor whom he carried about and kissed. Ah! if it should be so, and he should write—or if to the old man the older man should come! This little morning-star of earliest memory still shone brightly in the low heaven of boyhood, but has grown more and more pale the higher the daylight of life has risen; and now in reality I remember only this one thing clearly, that I formerly remembered all more clearly.

* The German expression, auf den Händen tragen (to carry on the hands), means “to treat with great affection” or “regard.” Richter was more sought after in later life than he cared to be.

As my father had already received his appointment as pastor at Joditz in the year 1765, I can the more exactly separate the reliquary of my Wonsiedler childhood from the early remembrances and reliques of Joditz.

This village is the second scene of this little historical melodrama; where, most honoured ladies and gentlemen, you will meet the hero of the piece under entirely new circumstances in our second lecture; for each lecture is laid in a new place of residence. Indeed, the whole history of these lectures, or the lectures of this history, are so skilfully and successfully arranged, that of the three usual unities of an historical drama, besides the first one of place—for of course I must make my appearance in the various places where I sojourned—besides this one, I say, no other unity but that of time is transgressed, for the hero from his entrance into life to his entrance on his professorship, must always be passing from one time to another; not to mention that while representing and acting the piece he must offend the unity of time by himself growing older; but in return for this he holds firmly the unity of interest running throughout, which can hardly be imagined greater than it is. But our hero's upward ascent has already begun, and we have the pleasure in our second lecture of meeting again, after two years, as the pastor's son, the historical personage whom in the first we left as the son of a Terzius only; for in 1765 my father was called to Joditz by the Baroness von Plotho (a Bodenhhausen by birth) of Zedtwitz, the wife of the same Plotho who was ambassador to Frederic the Only at the Imperial Diet of Regensburg, in the beginning of the Seven Years' War.

SECOND LECTURE.

EMBRACING THE PERIOD FROM THE 1ST OF AUGUST, 1765, TO
THE 9TH OF JANUARY, 1776—JODITZ—VILLAGE IDYLS.

MUCH HONOURED LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—You now meet the Professor of his Autobiographical History in the village of Joditz, whither he accompanied his parents in woman's hood and girl's frock. The Saale, which took its rise, like myself, in the Fichtelgebirge, had followed me thither, just as in later years it flowed past Hof when I went to live there. This river is the most beautiful, or at any rate the longest, river in Joditz, flowing round the town by the mountain side. The village itself is crossed by a little brook, with a wooden bridge. A commonplace castle and parsonage might well be the most important buildings here. The suburbs were not more than twice the size of the village itself, if one did not climb the mountain side; and yet to the Professor of his own history that village is of yet more importance than the town of his birth, for in it he passed the most important time of his life, namely, the boy-Olympiads.

I never could give my sympathy to those nineteen towns which quarrelled (according to Suidas) for the honour of being the birthplace of Homer, just as little as with those Dutch places, all of which would wish (according to Bayle) to have given birth to Erasmus. What can there be of such importance in the first day before or after nine months.

At the place of the grave the inhabitants might have more share in the merit—and also in the blame—than at the place of the cradle. Although, on the whole, many princes are born in capital towns, yet London, Paris, Berlin and Vienna are not proud of this; for if they were, then, by converse reasoning, would all those towns and villages where great rogues have been born have to be ashamed. The birth-lands might, at the most, be allowed to presume on the honour of the birth-towns in them, if any favourable judgment could be formed of their climate or inhabitants on account of their number of notable births; but one Pindar in Bœotia does not make a swallow-summer of it.

The real native town, namely, the mental one, is the place where the education begins and continues longest; and if it is so for world-renowned men, who seldom need education and seldom make use of it, how much more is it so for village- and town-renowned, mediocre men, like my hero, who gained so much his from bringing-up and spoiling, and who, by means of both, combined with his readings (which is only a more extensive educating and spoiling institution), has really become that which he now is—a Councillor-of-Embassy of Hildburghausen, a Heidelberg Doctor of Philosophy, a threefold Member of various Societies, and the present unworthy Possessor of this Autohistorical Professorship.

Let no poet, I pray, get himself born and reared in a Capital; but rather, if possible, in a village, or, at most, in a small town. The super-abundance and over-fascination of a large town are to the delicate, excitable, young soul a feasting at dessert, a drinking of burning spirits, a bathing in glowing wine. Life is exhausted in him during boyhood; and after the greatest he has nothing left for which to wish, but that which at any rate is smaller, namely, the village. One does not gain or acquire so much in coming from the town to the village, as vice versa,—from Joditz to Hof. Consider, too, that most important element for poets—Love. In the town he must draw around the torrid zone of his parents, friends, and acquaintance, the larger temperate and frigid zones of unloved men, who pass by him unknown, and for whom he is as little able to kindle and warm his love as is a ship's crew in meeting and passing another vessel.

But in a village one loves the whole population: no babe is buried but each one knows its name, its illness, and the mourning it has called forth. The inhabitants of Joditz thus lived and grew into one another; and this glorious sympathy for every one in the form of a man, which thus extends even to the stranger and the beggar, gives birth to a solid love for mankind and to the right pulsation of the heart. And then, when the poet wanders forth from his village, he brings to each whom he meets a portion of his heart, and he will have far to travel ere he has thus spent the whole of it among the streets and alleys.

Undoubtedly, there is a still greater misfortune than that of being reared in a metropolis; namely, the being reared on the road, like a child of the aristocracy, which journeys for years amid strange towns and people, and knows no other home than the travelling-coach.

We now come again to the pastor's son, whose life in Joditz, I think, I shall best represent to you if I pass it before you by-and-by, in one complete year of Idyls. But first, like mist, let that precede which does not belong to the bright days; the mist is the instruction I received, which, however, was not till after ten years. Learning of all sorts was life to me, and I would gladly have submitted myself, prince-like, to the instruction of half-a-dozen tutors; but I scarcely had one proper one. Still do I remember the delight of that winter-evening when I received into my hand the A, B, C book from the town, with the pencil to serve as pointer attached to it, on the cover of which were written (not without right) in real gold letters, the contents of the first page, which consisted of alternate red and black letters: a gambler derives less ecstasy before his gold and rouge et noir than I did before mine from that book whose pencil even I did not once stake.

After this,—when I had taken enough private instruction, with my inner Privatissima as master, to pass through the lowest classes of the school,—I was taken in a green taffeta cap, but already in short trousers (for which the schoolmistress openly supplemented my weak little fingers) to the high school that is, the school which stood opposite the parsonage, and there with the pencil I recited my letters to them all. As usual, I became fond of every living thing in the school, and, most of all, of the thin, consumptive, but cheerful schoolmaster; whose anxiety I always shared when on the watch for an unwary goldfinch behind the finch-trap which stood outside his window, or when he was about to throw the draw-net over the yellow-hammers on the fowling-floor out in the snow. In the Greenland winter-closeness of the crowded schoolroom, I remember still, with pleasure, the long linen stoppers which were stuffed into small air-holes bored in the wall, and which one only needed to draw out to receive into the open mouth a refreshing stream of frosty air from outside.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

Each fresh letter which the schoolmaster gave me to write reinvigorated me—as a picture would others—and I envied the rest for reciting their lessons, for I would fain have enjoyed the bliss of spelling as well as of singing in chorus.

Was it twelve o'clock and dinner not yet ready, there was then nothing left to be wished for by me and my brother Adam (who is now dead). For although he was much fonder of a bird's nest than of a whole colony of muses, we flew to the schoolroom, carrying our hunger with us—putting off the appeasing of it until later—in order not to lose a minute. People made much of this knowledge-craving self-sacrifice, but I remember very well that the common childish inclination to escape from the regular daily round had most of all to do with it. We wanted to have our dinners a few hours later, just as on fast-days and repentance-days we always looked forward to the late dinners. When all in the house is in a state of confusion on account of white-washing, for example, or perhaps from moving to another house, or from the arrival of several guests, then the little human fools are at their zenith of delight.

Unluckily I shut to myself for ever the schoolroom door, by an untimely complaint to my father about a big peasant lad (Zäh was his name—that posterity may know it), who had struck me on the knuckles with his clasp-knife. In proud anger, my father henceforth gave my brothers and myself our instruction alone, and every winter I had to see the children over the way sailing into the harbour which was closed to me. But still I had left to me the little by-pleasure of carrying over to the schoolmaster the frequent bulls and decrees of his village pope, and the Christmas gifts or presents from the newly-killed pig, or any other little plateful of eatables in place of the Romish Agnus Dei or the consecrated roses and baby-napkins.

Four hours before and three hours after dinner our father used to give us our lessons, which consisted entirely of learning by rote—verses, catechism, Latin words, and Lange's grammar. We had to learn the long rules of the genders for each declension, together with the exceptions and the adjoined Latin examples, without understanding a word of it all. If on a bright summer day my father went into the country, we got some such confounded exceptions as panis and piscis to learn for the next morning; but my brother Adam, for whom the whole day hardly sufficed for his frolics and games of all kinds, seldom had an eighth part of them left in his head, for it was not often that he was lucky enough to get such delightful words to decline as scamnum, or, better still, cornu, in the singular, of which he could at any rate say the Latin half. Believe me, ladies and gentlemen, it was no easy matter, on a bright June day, when the all-powerful ruler was not at home, to arrest and imprison oneself in a corner, there to stamp and impress two or three pages of words into one's head; on a bright summer-day, I say, it was no easy matter—but it was harder still on a short, snowy one in December; and you must not be surprised that my brother on this account always carried away a few stripes after such days. The Professor of his own history can, however, make this general declaration,—that never throughout his whole school-life was he flogged either in part or completely; the Professor always knew his part.

But let not this rote-learning system throw a false light on my indefatigable and loving father, who would sacrifice the whole day in writing out and committing to memory the sermons for his country parishioners, merely from overstrict conscientiousness, as several times he had had proofs of his extempore eloquence; my good father, who, in his weekly visits to the schoolroom and in his doubling the public instruction for children, and in all other things exceeded his duty by self-sacrifice, and who gave his tender, warm, fatherly heart chiefly to me, and who would break out into joyful tears over any little signs of talent and progress in me. In the whole of his educational system he committed no other faults, however strange are some which may occur, than those of the head—none of the will.

This method is to be recommended to the regular school-master, for by no other is so much time and trouble spared as by this, really convenient one, by which the pupil gains in his book a vicarius or adjunctus of the teacher, or his curator absentis, and magnetises himself like a powerful clairvoyant. Yes, this mental self-nourishing of children is capable of such extension, that I myself would undertake to superintend, through the letter-post, a whole school in North America, or fifty days' journey distant in the old world, merely by writing to my school-children what they were to learn each day, and keeping some or other insignificant person there to whom they should repeat it, while I myself would enjoy the consciousness of their beautiful intellectual *reminiscere Lenten Sunday.

In Speccius I translated, by order, a good deal at the beginning into Latin with that pleasure with which I climbed onto and stripped each fresh branch of learning. I turned the latter half into Latin by myself, but was unable to find anyone to correct the mistakes. I divined the meaning of the Colloquia (conversations) in Lange's grammar from longing to know what they were about, but in Joditz my father did not allow me to translate anything. The Greek alphabet I studied hungrily and thirstily, in a Greek grammar written in Latin, and at the end I wrote Greek fairly—that is, as far as the handwriting was concerned. How willingly would I have learned more, and how easily. If the body did not, yet the spirit of a language easily entered into me, as the third lecture of this winter half-year will, I daresay, best show to the world.

Once only, on a winter's afternoon—I might be from eight to nine years old—when my father was going to study a little Latin vocabulary book with me, that is, was going to set me to learn it by heart, and I had to read the first page over to him;—I read the word lingua, in spite of his corrections, not lingua, but always lin-gua; and the same mistake, regardless of all corrections, so often, that he became infuriated, and in angry impatience deprived me of the vocabulary book and its instruction for ever. I am still unable to this day to get to the bottom of this obstinate stupidity; but my heart was not influenced—this it has always said to me throughout my life—by any ill-temper, &c., indeed, it never was and certainly would not have been in this case, towards the father, who by a new lesson-book had just offered me a fresh boyish pleasure. This historical feature has, however, been intentionally related in this hall, in order that the impartiality of the historical researcher and Professor may be proved by those shadows which he points out, while acknowledging a hero whom he otherwise likes to display in the brightest light. But how often is it in life that poor innocent men, not understood and misunderstood, say lin-gua instead of the more correct lingua, and that, too, with the tongue (lingua) which at the same time means language (lingua).

* The reminiscere Sunday is the second Sunday in Lent. As people on that day are to recall the sufferings of Christ, so here the pupils are to recall to their memories the lessons which they have learned.—Tr.

With history, too,—both ancient and modern—natural history, besides the most important facts of geography, arithmetic, astronomy, and orthography—with all these branches of knowledge I became quite sufficiently acquainted; but not in Joditz—where I got on very well for twelve years without a word of them—but many years afterwards, when I acquired them piecemeal from the Allgemeine Bibliothek. All the more ardent was my thirst for books in this intellectual Sahara. Each one was a fresh green oasis, especially the Orbis Pictus and the Gespräche im Reiche der Todten; but my father's library, like many another open one, was seldom open; except when he was not at home and in it. At any rate, I often lay on the flat top of a wooden grating (like a magnified wild-beast cage), and crept upon books, like the great jurist Baldus, in order to get one for myself. Let any one only consider: in a village destitute of people, in a solitary parsonage, for such a listening soul books must have been speaking beings, wealthy foreign guests, Mæcenases, travelling princes, and inhabitants of the new world or the first Americans for a European.

It is true that I, as an A-B-C-historian, did not in the least understand the quarto volume of Gespräche im Reiche der Todten, but I read it as I also did the newspaper, though only an A-B-C-geographer also, and could retail much information from both of them. I used to relate portions of the former to my father—one evening, the love-story of Roxana and the Turkish emperor, which I had read during his absence,—without his disapprobation, and I did the same for my newspaper extracts with an old Baroness whom we knew. My father used to have the Baireuth paper given him by his patroness, the Baroness Plotho of Zedtwitz; every month or quarter—as often as he went to Zedtwitz—he brought the monthly or quarterly numbers home altogether, and he and I read this huge pile with profit, just because we got them more as volumes than as single sheets. A political paper supplies one with true information, when it is read not in separate sheets, but in monthly numbers or in volumes; because, in the compass of a complete part, it has collected a sufficient number of sheets to counteract each other; like the air, it cannot at once show its colour in single puffs and blows, but only in its whole extent, as the said air, shows its sky-blue colour only when in a large mass. Of a morning I usually carried my news-atlas over to the castle to the old Frau von Reitzenstein, and expounded at the coffee-table this or that portion of news which I had brought with me, and listened to my own praises. I still remember a plural word, “Conföderirte,” which occurred frequently at that time. Most probably this plural was in Poland, but I cannot recollect that I took the slightest interest in it, probably because I understood nothing about the matter. Thus calmly and impartially were the Polish affairs judged in our village, as well by me as by the old Frau von Reitzenstein, my auditress.

The fibres of our hero's mind, thirsting for knowledge, forced and curved themselves about in all directions to get a hold and suck in nourishment. He manufactured clocks, of which the faces were the most successful part, and which had a pendulum, one wheel, and a weight, and which stood well. A sun-dial too he devised, by marking a dial-face in ink on a wooden plate, and then setting the dial-pin by the church-clock, and fixing it there; thus he frequently kn w what time it was. He liked best to make the figures,—as many States do,—on the clock faces, and that, too, beforehand ; and like Lichtenberg, who made the title before the book. The present author showed in miniature a cardboard box, in which he arranged a diminutive library of 16mo books made from the margins of his father's 8vo sermons, which he sewed together and cut into shape. The contents were theological and protestant, and consisted in every case of short explanatory notes on verses copied from Luther's Bible ; the verses themselves he omitted in his little book. Thus in our Friedrich Richter, there already lay a little Friedrich von Schlegel, who, in just the same way in his extract "Lessing's Geist," picked out Lessing's opinion on certain authors, but was not particular to state the passages themselves.

In the same way our hero threw himself into the art of painting also ; many a mounted Potentate sat, or rather lay, to him while he traced round his features with a fork in such a way that a piece of paper underneath, covered with grease and soot, and with the reverse side downwards, left striking likenesses of them printed on a sheet of white paper under it. That, under sunnier circumstances, he might have unfolded into a second Raphael Mengs, who, unlike the first one, had to be whipped from his painting, not to it, I hardly think at present, however brightly coloured the first white and red balls, the square red bricks, the rounded slate pencil, and the splendid colour-shells in the paint-box, and the green rose-beetles may still shine in my memory ; and though something may be inferred from the fact that on the receipt of a paint-box, he coloured the whole of the Orbis Pictus after life ; the supposition would only be a little more correct, than if one should predict a great financial correspondent from his skill in making herrings in winter. This art of his, of supplying herrings on the land at such a distance from the sea-coast, was as follows : when he had to go for the bread, he would wade in the brook and would there gently raise one of the stones under which a grundel, or any other still smaller fish, was to be caught. He then put these into a hollow cabbage-stalk (this represented the herring-tun), and duly salted them; and as soon as the little tun was full, he would have had herrings to eat, had not they all smelt so badly. Not more suitable, but rather less so, when considered as precursors of a youthful financial correspondent, would be such surrogate contrivances as the following, viz., that he served up the halves of dried pears for little hams, and pigeons' feet, cut off and roasted in a potsherd, for a complete dinner, or that he drove snails to pasture. In fact, any future historical investigator of the present historical investigator, would be considered by me to be in the highest degree ridiculous, who should wish to deduce anything extraordinary by selecting such fragmentary pieces as are scattered throughout the childhood of anyone else; the foolish man would seem to me just like that Parisian quack, who, with the assistance of a Jesuit, fitted together some elephant bones, and sold them as the true skeleton of the German giant, Teutobach. The beard does not make a philosopher, though it may make a sailor or a malefactor, when they come from the ship or prison with it, because, while there, they do not come under the barber's razor.

As the boundless activity of our hero threw itself more into intellectual than bodily exercises—all of which, however, he followed with indescribable avidity, he invented, not new languages, but new letters. He took the symbols of the calendar, or geometrical signs from an old book, and chemical ones or the latest ones out of his own head, and, by putting them together, made himself a new alphabet out of them. When this was done, the next thing was to make some use of his alphabetical solitaire, by clothing in it a few pages of copied matter. In this way he was his own secret writer, and a player at hide-and-seek with himself; but he could, too, without peeping into Büttner's Comparative Tables of Written Characters, read off his new ones on the spot as easily as ordinary ones, because he had placed the latter, like a warrant of apprehension, letter for letter, under the secret ones, and only needed to refer to them. This time one could perhaps blame the so-called historical investigator less, if he would see the foundation of a Councillor-of-Embassy, or of an ambassador himself, in this ciphering and deciphering, which, so early as this, sought meritless in the contents than in the external clothing of them. I have, in fact, since then acquired the character of a Councillor-of-Embassy, and I could do a bit of ciphering to this day.

My soul, perhaps taking after that of my father, was thoroughly open to music, and for it I had a hundred Argus-ears. When the schoolmaster played the church-goers out with his final cadenzas, my whole little being laughed and skipped with joy, as in the spring-time; or on the morning after the night dancing at the Kirchweihe (at which my father used to send loud thunders of excommunication on the Sunday following), when, to his vexation, the foreign musicians, together with the be-ribboned village youths drew up in front of the parsonage with their shawms and fiddles, then I would climb on to the yard wall, and a world of jubilation sounded through my yet small breast and the spring-time of pleasure played therein with the spring, and I thought not a word of my father's sermons. I devoted hours, on an old untuned piano, whose only tuning-hammer and tuning-master was the weather, to my fantasias, which certainly were freer than the most daring in the whole of Europe, as I knew neither note nor chord nor anything else; for my father, though such a finished player, had shown me neither note nor key.

But when by chance I hit at times on a short melody or harmony of three to six notes—like some good modern composer of tunes for rope-dancing, witch-dancing, or finger-dancing on the piano strings—then I was indeed a happy being, and repeated my finger-hit as everlastingly as any good modern German poet repeats the brain-hit with which he gained his first applause. Heliogabalus condemned the cook who made him some bad broth to eat nothing else but it until he had discovered a better one; but the poet, on the other hand, acting more generously, treats the reading world to an excellent broth at so many a Leipzig book-fair, that at last it tastes as stale as the bad broth of the emperor's cook.

In the future literary history of our hero, it will become doubtful whether he was not perhaps born for philosophy rather than poetry. In earliest times the word "philosophy"—though there was also a second word, "orient"—was to me an open Heaven's gate, through which I looked onto long, long gardens of joy. Never shall I forget the inner sensation, hitherto untold to any, when I was present at the birth of my self-consciousness, of which I can specify both time and place. One morning, when still quite a young child, I was standing under the doorway, and looking towards the woodstack on the left, when suddenly the internal vision, "I am an ego," passed before me like a lightning flash from heaven, and has remained with me shining brightly ever since; my ego had seen itself then for the first time and for ever. Deceptions of the memory are here hardly conceivable, since no story related to me could mingle its additions with an occurrence which took place in the shrouded Holy-of-Holies of a human being, and whose strangeness alone has given permanence to such everyday circumstances as those which accompanied it.

In order to represent most truthfully the Joditz life of our Hans Paul (for so we will call him for a time, always however subject to change with other names), we shall do best, I think, if we conduct it through a complete year of Idyls, breaking up the normal year into four seasons, like so many Idyllic quarters: four Idyls exhaust his happiness.

Let none wonder at an Idyllic kingdom and an Arcadian world in a little hamlet and its parsonage. In the smallest flower-bed one can rear a tulip-tree which will stretch its flowery branches over the whole garden; and the life-giving air can be inhaled as well at the window as in the wide wood under the open sky. Nay, is not the man's spirit itself (with all its infinite heavenly courts) confined in a body five feet high, with membranes, Malpighian glands and capillaries, and having only the five narrow windows of the senses to open on that immense round-eyed, round-sunned—All?—and yet it sees and reproduces an All.

I hardly know with which of the four Idyllic quarters to begin; for each is a little fore-heaven of the next; but, I think, on the whole, the progression of happiness will best appear if we begin with Winter and January.

In the cold weather my father, like the Swiss flocks, was brought down from the heights of his study upstairs, and, to the joy of the children, sojourned in the plain of the parlour. In the morning he sat in the window-corner, committing his Sunday sermon to memory, while his three sons—Fritz, that is myself, Adam, and Gottlieb (for Heinrich did not come until near the end of the Joditz Idyllic life), carried the full coffee-cup to him by turns, in order to enjoy the greater pleasure of bringing back the empty one, as the bearer was allowed to take out the unmelted candy-sugar which he used as a remedy for his cough. Out of doors truly all was wrapped in silence: the brook by the ice, the village by the snow; but in our room there was life—a dove-cote under the stove, siskin and goldfinch cages at the windows, the invincible bull-dog, our Bonne and night-watcher of the parsonage, on the floor, besides a Spitzbergen dog and the pretty Scharmantel, a present from the Frau von Plotho—and, next door to us, the kitchen with two maids in it; and in addition to these, at the farther end of the house, the stable, with all possible kinds of cattle, pigs and feathered things, with their accompanying noises; the threshers too, with their flails, at work in the courtyard, I might add to the number. Thus surrounded by noisy society, the whole masculine portion of the parlour passed the morning in learning, in close proximity to the cooking of the feminine portion.

No business in the world is without its holidays, and so I too had the fresh-air holidays—like mineral spring holidays—of being allowed to go out in the snow into the yard, and to the threshing-floor. And when, too, any important verbal business had to be transacted in the village, at the schoolmaster's, for instance, or the tailor's, I was sent off in the midst of my lessons, and thus got out into the free and cold air and could measure myself with the newly fallen snow. At noon, too, before our dinner-time, we children had the hungry satisfaction of seeing the threshers fall-to and devour theirs in the kitchen.

The afternoon again was still more important and richer in joys. Winter shortened and sweetened the lesson hours. In the long twilight our father walked to and fro, and we children, holding his hand, trotted as well as we could.

under his dressing-gown. At the tolling of the vesper bell all arranged themselves in a circle, and with one voice sang the hymn, Die finstre Nacht bricht stark herein. Only in villages—not in towns, where there is in reality more night- than day-work—is there a meaning and beauty in this evening tolling, this swan-song of the dying day; the vesper bell is, as it were, a muffler to our over-loud hearts, and, like the Ranz des Vaches of the plain, it calls men from their toils and troubles to the land of quiet and dreams. After a pleasant watching for the moonrise of the tallow candle under the kitchen-door, our large room was at once lighted up and barricaded, that is, the shutters were put in and bolted, and the children felt themselves safe behind these window breastworks and ramparts, and secured against the Knecht Ruprecht, who could not now get in, but could only grumble harmlessly outside.

This, too, was the time when we children were allowed to undress and hop about in our long, trailing night-gowns. Idyllic joys of all sorts alternated with one another.

My father either entered in an interleaved quarto Bible, opposite to each verse, the reference to any book in which he had read anything concerning it, or else, as was more frequently the case, he had his ruled folio copying book before him, and composed complete oratorios of church-music in full score, undisturbed by the children's din: in both cases, but in the latter with most pleasure, I watched the writing and was particularly delighted when whole pages were quickly filled by the pausing of several of the instruments. He composed his internal melodies quite without help from external notes.—as Reichard recommended—and in harmony undisturbed by the noise of the children. We all sat playing at the long writing and dining table—and also under it. Among the pleasures which sink for ever with the beautiful time of childhood is this one, that sometimes, when a severe frost set in, the long table was pushed up to the bench by the stove for the sake of the warmth; we children were on the watch for this joyful event the whole winter. Now, round the ill-shaped coach-like stove were two wooden benches, and our gain was that we could sit or run on them, and that we had stove-summer close to us even at meal times.

But what a climax of worth did the winter evenings reach once a week, when the old errand-woman arrived in the kitchen covered with snow, and carrying her basket of meat, fruit, and other provisions from the town; and we all had the distant town in miniature before our eyes in the room, and before our noses by means of the butter-cakes.

In the earlier part of childhood a pleasure-dessert was allowed by our father of a winter evening, after the early suppers. The farm-maid served it up at her distaff in the kitchen, with as much illumination as the pine-splinters could give, which from time to time we stuck lighted into the pine-stick, as they did in Westphalia. On this dessert-table stood—besides many other plates of sweetmeats and folk-lore ice-glasses, such as Cinderella—the pine-apple of a story of the maid's own forcing, about a shepherd and his combats with the wolves, in which at one time the danger was on the increase, and at another his resources. I still feel the success of that shepherd, as if it was my own, and in this I see, from my own experience, that children are much more affected in stories by the progression of prosperity than of adversity, and that they wish the heavenly path to lead upwards to infinity, but the other one only so far downwards as is necessary for the exaltation and glorification of the heavenly throne. These children's wishes become men's wishes, and we would more strongly demand their fulfilment from the poet, if a new heaven were as easy to create as a new hell. But any tyrant can give unheard-of pains, while for the discovery of unheard-of joys he himself must offer prizes. The skin is the foundation of this; upon it, inch by inch, a hundred hells can pitch their camps, but the five sense-heavens hover airy and uniform above us.

Only the end of the winter evening contained a horrid wasp sting, or vampire tongue, for our heret. The children, you must know, had to betake themselves at nine o'clock to the guest-room, in the second floor; my brothers were together in one room, and I shared the guest-room with my father. Until he had finished his reading downstairs, which lasted for two hours, I lay up above, with my head under the bedclothes, in a perspiration for fear of ghosts, and in the darkness I saw the lightning in the cloudy Spirit-heaven, and it seemed to me as if man himself was spun of Spirit-caterpillars. Every night I helplessly suffered thus for two hours, until my father at length came upstairs and drove away the ghosts, like a morning sun chasing away the dreams. The next morning all fear was quite forgotten, as if it had been a dream, though it always returned again in the evening. Yet I have never said a word about this,—except to the world this day.

This terror of ghosts was certainly—if not created, yet—fostered by my father. He spared us not one of all the ghostly apparitions and tricks of which he had heard, and even on some occasions believed himself to have experienced; but, like the old theologians, to a firm belief in them he joined a firm courage against them, and Christ and the Cross were his shield against the whole ghostly universe. Many a child, physically very timid, displays at the same time great spiritual bravery, but merely from lack of imagination;* while a second child, on the other hand—like myself—trembles at the invisible world, because the imagination gives it a visible form, but easily takes courage against the visible, as that never reaches the depth and height of the other. Thus any sudden appearance of physical danger—for example, a horse running away, a thunder-clap, war, or the fire alarm—made me only collected and calm, because I fear only with the imagination, not with the senses; and to me, even a ghostly form would at once congeal to an ordinary earthly body, if I had once got over the first shudder, so long as it did not drive me again, by grimaces and noises, into the endless realm of fancy. But how, then, is the instructor to guard against the preponderance of the tragic spirit-invoking imagination? Not by refutation or Biesterian and Wagnerian resolutions of the supernatural into the commonplace—for the possibility of unresolved exceptions still remains firmly grasped by the deepest feelings—but partly by prosaically leading up to, quartering on, and familiarizing with the times and places, which otherwise kindle the bewitching flames of the imagination, and partly by arming the fancy against fancy, by opposing the spirit to the spirit, and to the devil—God.

* Into many prosaic souls one ought to instil a little spiritual fear, from religion or poetry.

Even in the day-time, on particular occasions, this ghostly dread would sometimes come over me. At a burial, I always had to carry my father's Bible through the church into the sacristy, before the procession with pastor, schoolmaster, children, cross and myself, set out amid psalms from the church to the cemetery near the village. Willing and courageous enough did I gallop through the gloomy silently-hearkening church into the little sacristy; but which of us can picture to himself the fearful, trembling flight-leaps with the whole spirit world pursuing at my heels, and that frightful shoot from the church-door? And if one did describe it, who would not laugh? And still I always accepted the office of Bible-bearer without a word, and silently kept my fear to myself.

We come now to a larger Idyllic period, to the Joditz spring and summer. The two seasons, particularly in the country, fall for various reasons into one Idyl. The spring (in reality) dwells only in the mind; outside in the fields there is only summer, which everywhere is contrived only for the fruits and the present. The snow is the curtain which merely requires to be drawn up from the stage, or the earth, that the summer pleasures may begin in the village—the town takes its pleasures only in the winter—for ploughing and sowing are themselves a spring harvest to the countryman, and for a parson who farms his own fields, and for his cooped-up sons they bring fresh scenes upon the stage. We poor children, shut up in the parsonage by our gaoler and the winter, were then freed by the heaven-sent angel of spring, and let out into the open fields, and meadows and gardens. Then there was ploughing, sowing, planting, mowing, hay-making, corn-cutting, and harvesting everywhere. Our father was there and helped, and the children helped him, I particularly, as the eldest. You should only know, my friends, what it is to escape suddenly,—not from town walls, which enclose many a field within them, but—from parsonage walls, out over the whole village, and beyond it, into the unwallled space and to look down from above into the village, which one has never seen into from below.

My father did not superintend the field-labours as an overseer or taskmaster (although they were carried on by socmen), but as a kindly pastor, who wished to take part alike with nature and his flock. When I see other ecclesiastics, land possessors and avaricious men, equipped so plentifully from head to foot with sucking-trunks, sucking-stings, and all kinds of sucking appliances, I find in my father's case, on the other hand, that the sucking-in system was in altogether a too languishing and weak condition; ten times a day he would think of giving,—he had but little to do it with,—but hardly once of taking, by which, however he himself might have been enabled to give; since then, I have had cause to admire the good food-forceps of many a human insect, but my father held nothing in his hand but the birth-forceps, which bring and preserve the life of others. Heavens! how different—and how is it that people do not understand this better?—are the regular commercial, clerical, and noble men, who, although they know what is fitting, use their hands as good bird-traps, which open and shut only to catch something, and who only open their hands in order to shut them.

Now began our life in, that is under, the heavens. Those mornings still twinkle with fresh-fallen dew on which I used to carry my father's coffee to him in the parsonage garden, beyond the village, where he was learning his sermon in the little summerhouse, with windows opening on all sides, just as we children used afterwards to learn our Lange in the grass. The evening took us a second time into the garden among the currant and gooseberry bushes, to gather the salad with our mother. Being able to have supper without candles is one of the unrecognised pleasures of the country. When we had enjoyed this, my father used to take his pipe out of doors, that is, into the walled court of the parsonage, while I and my brothers sprang about in our long night-gowns in the fresh evening air, and behaved like the swallows, still crossing each other, above our heads, and flew nimbly hither and thither, just as though collecting for our nests.

The most lovely of summer birds (a delicate blue butterfly) fluttered around our hero in this beautiful season; it was his first love. She was a blue-eyed peasant girl of his own age, with slim figure, oval face, slightly marked with small-pox, but with a thousand looks which take captive the heart as in a magic-circle. Augusta, or Augustina, lived with her brother Römer, a fine young fellow, known as a choral singer and reckoner. It did not indeed come to a declaration on the part of Paul,—unless this lecture shall fall into her hands,—but he played out his love-story with spirit at a distance, she in the women's seats in church, and he in the vicar's pew, by looking at her closely enough, and not growing tired of it. But this was the beginning only! for when of an evening she drove her milch cows home, which he always knew by the unforgettable bell, he used to climb on the wall to see and beckon to her, and then ran again to the door, to the speaking-grating,—she the nun without, he the monk within,—in order to screw his hand through a chink, (no more than this was allowed outside,) and to drop something eatable into her hand, sugar-almonds, or some other dainty, which he had brought from the town. Many a summer, alas! he did not three times attain to such happiness,—generally he had to consume all the good things himself, and the vexation into the bargain. Yet when for once his almonds did fall, not on stony ground, but in the Eden of his eyes, then these grew from them in his imagination a whole blossoming garden full of fragrance, wherein he would walk for weeks. For pure love wishes only to give and to become happy by making so; and if there was an eternity of perpetually-increasing capability of giving happiness, what would be more blissful than love?

The cow-bells remained for a long time the Ranz des Vaches of the high and distant Alps of his childhood, and still his old heart's-blood would stir and boil if these sounds were again wafted to him. "They are tones," he would say, "brought by an Æolian harp out of the far, far beautiful distance, and I almost could cry with longing when I hear them." For let one associate with love even the smallest tone, if a cow even is the bell-ringer, and it redoubles its Orphic power of edifying and enchanting, and its invisible waves cradle his heart and bear it along to infinity; he knows not whether he is at home or far away, and the man weeps for joy as well for what he has as for what he lacks.

In this focus of love Augustine remained towards Paul, and never during many years did he live to see the time when he so much as pressed her hand. Of a kiss we will not think. Even when he sometimes flew shamefaced and hastily to the lips of a plain servant girl of his parents, whom he did not love a bit, both body and soul boiled up unconsciously and innocently in the kiss; but the actual lips of a beloved one, who shone down just at the hottest, in the aphelion, on his deepest, most spiritual love would have immersed him in burning heavens, and melted and volatilized him therein into a glowing æther. And I could wish that he had been volatilized once or a few times while still at Joditz. When in his thirteenth year, he, or much more, his eye, was driven eight miles from the beloved one, as his father had received a better living, he burdened a young Joditz tailor, whom his father had taken with him, for love of the dear village he had left, and had kept for some weeks in the new and capacious parsonage, with a number of petty potentates, whom he had drawn from painted life, with grease and soot, and had coloured with deceptive exactness, with the help of his paint-box: these he commissioned the tailor to deliver to Augustine with the message that the knights and princes were from him, and he gave them as an everlasting keepsake.

Another love affair of the same period, which did not last longer than a dinner, was spun by him—the young lady did not know a word about it—quite secretly in the depth of his bosom. Once at Köditz he sat at a table of grown-up people, opposite the said lady and stared at her incessantly. There sprang up in him a love unutterable in sweetness, inexhaustible to the gazer, a fermentation of the heart, a heavenly annihilation and dissolution of the whole being into the eye only. She did not say a word to the bewitched boy, and much less did he to her; but had she stooped, and it might be kissed the poor youth, he would have gone straight to heaven for very bliss.

He retained the feeling however more than the face, of which nothing remained but the small-pox marks. Now as this beauty is already the second one marked with the small-pox—in future lectures others will follow—the Professor thinks it his duty to explain to all fair, vaccinated hearers, that he knows how to appreciate them just as much and as well as anyone else, but that at that time there was a different fashion in faces. Paul has this peculiarity—and he pledges himself to-day in this assemblage of beauty—that he can make any female face—whose so-called ugliness must only not be moral ugliness—in the highest degree charming and enchanting, without all cosmetic artifices, without rouge-pots and salve-boxes, without starch or soapy water, and without night-masks, if he is allowed for the purpose, a few evenings—songs—heart-words, and that no one shall appear more beautiful than the person in question—naturally only in his own eyes; for who can speak for others?

The lady just mentioned is a strong confirmation of this; for when he met her again at Hof twenty years afterwards, as she was living opposite to him, he found only the marks left, nothing else; she herself was plain and crooked, and I will not tell her name.

Pure love has such unlimited power to create and elevate—just as low love has to destroy and suppress—that the representation of it would have more influence on us, had it not been described to us so often; but it is for this reason alone that it has been able to bear the many thousand volumes which paint it. Let anyone deprive a man, who in the time of love looks on the landscapes—the stars—the flowers and mountains—the tones, the songs—the pictures and poems—yes, and humanity and death—with poetic enjoyment—deprive this man, I say, of love, and he will have lost the tenth Muse, or rather the mother of the Muses; each one feels in after years when this sacred intoxication is forbidden, that to all the Muses the tenth one is lacking.

We come now to our hero's Sundays, on which days the Idyls visibly make progress. Sundays seem made for pastors and pastors' children. A good lot of Trinity Sundays, or the greatest number of them, twenty-seven, gave special delight to our Paul, although by the whole twenty-seven not a single summer day more came to the world or the church than in other years. In towns the birthdays of princes and magistrates and fair-days are the true Trinity Sundays. On a bright Sunday morning

Paul commenced his enjoyment by walking through the village before church-time with a bunch of keys,—he used to jingle them on the way to show the village that he was there—and unlocking the parsonage garden with one of them to get some roses for the pulpit desk. In the church all was bright enough, for the long windows intersected the cold floor and the women's pews with broad bands of light, and the sunshine fell around the enchantress Augustina. A pleasure, too, not to be despised was the being allowed (with his colleagues in office) after church-time and before dinner to carry the regular half-pound of bread and the money to the labourers of the week, particularly as his father always liked to send the peasants an extra large piece of bread, and thus give them a pleasure, which children always like to carry, and Paul in particular. Sometimes, too, he had to carry the slice of bread to Römer, and then he used to look around him for the saint of his church and his heart—but always in vain.

For in his perspective love-painting ten steps more or less were of some consequence; and granted that through the intervention of some particularly favourable goddess, he had stood only half a step from her—but at such unrealized bliss I will not so much as hint, for he would not then have been content without audible speech.

I maintain that no occupant of the sheriff's, prince's, lecturer's, pontiff's, or any other chair has any idea how pastors' children enjoy a Sunday evening (only a member of the clergy himself can know it), when, with the two services over, they, as it were, celebrate with their father the late Sabbath rest after the church-trouble and the exchange of the surplice for the light dressing-gown—particularly in the villages where in the summer the whole population feasts and enjoys the pleasures of the eye.

I should perhaps be accused of remissness if I neglected to mention another Trinity pleasure merely because it was a rare one; on this account it was so much the more a pleasure when Hagen, the pastor of Köditz appeared with his family at the sermon to hear my father and pay him a call, and Paul's playmate, his little son, showed himself at the church door. When Paul and his brother caught sight of him at a distance through the grating of the choir seats, there began on both sides a fidgetting and shuffling, heart-leaping and signalling, and any attention to the sermon was now quite out of the question, even had propaganda, ten chief court-preachers and pastores primarii stationed themselves in the pulpit and talked themselves hoarse. The present fore-Sabbath, the fore-land of brightest hopes, the luncheon of the day, must now alone be enjoyed at a distance and in church. But he who now demands a description of the holy zephyrs and calm of the evening after the first joyous storm of youthful and parental preparations, forgets that I have not unlimited powers. I should, however, like to add that late in the evening the Joditz parsonage accompanied the Köditz far beyond the village, and that consequently this tour over the village into the distance, enhanced by the parents and the little friends, especially at such a late hour, must have conferred and left behind it many blessings, of which more in the future.

We now come, ladies and gentlemen, to those Joditz Idyls which were enjoyed by Paul, more without Joditz than within, and which will perhaps be most conveniently divided into those when he himself was not at home and those when his father was not. I will begin with the latter, as I reckon the absence of fathers on journeys among the unrecognized pleasures of childhood; for at these times the mothers dispense a glorious academic freedom from reports and a full liberty of action. Paul and his brother could slip out behind their mother's back while she was deep in her business and get over the yard door (to which was attached a bell) to hunt some of the forbidden game of the village, i.e., butterflies, grundels, and birch-juice, or reeds for whistles; or they would fetch a new playmate, the schoolmaster's Fritz, or help to toll the midday bell for the pleasure of being swung into the air by the rope. There was also another pleasure of considerable importance within the court-yard—only Paul might easily have broken his neck at it, and so put an end beforehand to my whole professorship. It consisted in this: Paul climbed on to the cross-beam in the barn with a ladder and then sprang into the hay lying down below to the height of a storey and a half for the pleasure of the flight through the air.

Sometimes he would place his harpsichord at the open window in an upper storey and thump violently on it that the passers-by might hear him. To make the tones louder down below, he would draw a quill sharply with the right hand across the strings, which he held down at the same time with the left on the key board. Some strokes of the quill, too, he tried on the strings beyond the bridge, but there was not much melody to be got out of that.

The Joditz summer Idyls naturally occur still oftener when one entirely leaves that village and goes to another or into the town. Is there a more blessed order on a bright summer day after the repetition of the Lange's Grammar than this: "Get yourself ready to go with me to Köditz after dinner"? Never was the dinner more tasteless. Paul had to run to keep up with his father's long strides.

After an hour he had his out-door games with the playmate and his mother—whose voice still sounds from the distance like the strains of a lute or like harmonic bells—and sometimes, too, one or another laurel wreath, large enough for his little head. His father, in paternal delight at the way in which Paul caught up and retained his sermons, of which on Sunday evening he would repeat the subject and the different headings straight off, used to tell him to repeat them again to their friends;—and the little fellow, may I say it, stood the test firmly. In a boy who all his life had seen nothing greater—not a count—not a general—not a superintendent—and very seldom a nobleman, at the most, twice in a year (the Herr von Reitztein, who was living in concealment having been a long time under arrest)—in such a boy, it displayed courage to speak so publicly before the pastor's family. But fire and courage always came to him when he began speaking, however shy he might be when silent. Yes, did he not venture once during his father's absence, on something still more bold? Did he not one afternoon, when his father was out, take his hymn book and go forth with it to an old woman, who for years had been bedridden, and there place himself by the bedside, as if he were a full-grown pastor making a sick visit, and begin to read such of the hymns as were appropriate? But he was soon interrupted by the weeping and sobbing with which, not the old woman—she remained coldly indifferent to everything—but he himself, listened to the hymns.

One day, his father took our hero with him to the Court at Versailles, as one may call Zedtwitz without exaggeration, since it was the residence of the patron of the Joditz pastors. Whenever he had been at Court, which often happened twice in a month during the summer, he aroused the provincial astonishment of his wife and child in the evening to the utmost, by tales about great people and their court ceremonies, and the court feasts, and ice-cellars, and Swiss cows, and how he himself was quickly taken from the “domestics’” room to the old Herr von Plotho, then to the young lady, to whom he gave a few preliminary exercises on the piano, and finally to the Baroness von Plotho, born a Bodenhausen, and how on account of his vivacity he was always invited to the dinner table, even when (this made no difference) the most distinguished landowners of the Voigtland were dining there. But, like an old Lutheran court preacher, he acknowledged the illimitable greatness of rank, as he did the apparitions, without trembling before either. And yet, I say, how much happier are ye, children of the present time, who are brought up so self-dependently, who are taught no prostration before rank, and are strengthened from within against the external glitter! That mile-distant prostration of the Joditz pastor’s sons before the Zedtwitz throne was strengthened each year by a magnificent carriage which came always on Maundy Thursday to fetch my father, in the capacity of Confessor, to administer the sacrament to the family. The children can talk of the carriage, for they always had the delight of a drive round the village in it before starting home in the evening.

You will now perhaps have some idea of our hero’s undertaking when he accompanied the Court Confessor—who had talked of him among the great people with too much love and praise—to Zedtwitz to be introduced to the reigning house. After he had walked to and fro for a long time before the ancestral pictures down below in the castle, the Baroness von Plotho received him on the stairs as in a reception room; Paul immediately darting up, grasped her dress according to court regulations and imprinted the ceremonial kiss upon it. And thus the audience was happily got over without either Knights or Courtmarshalls and the lad was free to run about again.

And this he did in the magnificent garden. Scarcely has any other Ambassador than our little Hildburghausen Councillor of Legation ever inhaled and imbibed such romantic hours immediately after the stiff formal audience, as those avenues, springs, hot-beds, and arbours must have afforded to a village child, more internally than externally imaginative, who wandered alone for the first time amid these splendours with oppressed and expanding breast. What brought the soaring Paul down again to vulgar reality was a wooden bird on a string with an iron beak, which he could shoot into the black of a target. A delicious fruit cake sent down from the castle preserved the happy medium between flying and standing; the sweet flavour of it still remains in the reliquary of our hero. O ye lovely, lonely hours and walks for that hungering village child, whose heart would so fain have filled itself with—nay, even have longed for—the outer world.

With less of court glitter come now, under the summer Idyls, those frequent errands which Paul, with fitting wallet on his back, had to make to his grandparents at Hof, to fetch meat and coffee and all the other things which either were not to be had at all in the village or at any rate not at the very lowest town prices. His mother supplied him with a few little coins to take with him—it must not seem as if the whole was given,—so that his grandmother, generous to her daughter and son-in-law, and stingy only to the rest of the world, might fill his wallet with anything that might then be on the bill of fare.

The two hours' road led him over a commonplace, uninteresting country, through a wood, and therein over a foaming stony river, till at last from a hill-slope, the view of the town down below in the plain, with its two united towers and the Saale, filled to overflowing the heart of the little messenger who was easily satisfied. With childish dread of all times of war and tribulation, he passed the mouth of a cave on the outskirts of the town where, according to the legend, the people of Hof had hidden themselves in the thirty years' war; the neighbouring fulling-mill with its ceaseless thunderstrokes and ponderous beams expanded his little village soul sufficiently for it to take in the town more comfortably.

When now he had kissed the hand of this tall serious grandfather, sitting behind his loom, and of the joyous little grandmother, and had delivered his mother's official letter—his father was too proud to ask for anything—the scanty money was publicly handed over and the secret articles of petition were delivered up behind the door in the passage; and in the afternoon he trotted back home with his knapsack full, and with some sugar almonds for Augustine, in high delight over the parental provision-ship on his back.

He still remembers one summer-day, when on his homeward journey, about two o'clock, as he was looking down on the sunlit mountain-slopes, the gliding waves of the corn-fields, and the hastening shadows of the clouds, an unknown indefinite longing came over him, with more of grief in it than of pleasure, a longing for something he had never known. It was the whole being yearning for the heavenly goods of life, which still lay undefined and colourless in the dark depths of the heart, and which brightened momentarily under the penetrating sunbeams. There is a time of longing when the object as yet bears no name, the longing knows only its own name. In later life, too, the power of this painful, searching longing has been asserted less by the moonshine whose silvery sea softly melts the heart and thus gently leads it to the Infinite, than by the afternoon sun, shining over a broad landscape; in Paul's works this is several times introduced and described.

In the winter's snow also, Paul had frequently to make a journey as Hof and Holland* messengers in times of pecuniary want; at these times he had to use his wit in negotiating loans with his grandfather; so, too, in the coldest weather he was allowed to accompany his father to the hospitable parsonages in the neighbourhood. To these weekly gymnastic exercises he owes much of his tenacious strength in after-life, and they certainly were the best antidote for his absurd physical training, which, like others at that time, with the fur caps, purgatives, and air preventers, the muffling, shutting up, and coddling, did not prevent, but rather prepared, an unhappy future. The village children and the poor are fortunate in this, that the summer, with its spring and autumn on right and left, happily extirpates the weeds of winter; the plants which have faded in the winter hot-house recover immediately when gambolling about bare-head and bare-foot in the open air and regain their strength on the cool and fresh fare. Only the good princesses are unhelpt by any season. Yet people do not believe that the summer repairs the evil of winter, but rather the reverse, that this indoor season is the doctor of the out-door one.

* Holland at this time had become proverbial for its pecuniary embarrassments.—Tr.

I will now give you the last and greatest never-failing summer Idyl, which occurred regularly on the Monday after St. James' day. On that day his grandfather always sent a coach to take Paul's tender mother to the yearly fair at Hof, and he always had a place in it with them. Not to hurt the cold historian, I here remark quietly and simply, that if a more common town is more to a village child than a Kirmess village,* surely a Jahrmarkt town must be a many-times-multiplied double-town, and consequently must excel in splendour all that a village youngster has ever pictured to himself. And thus it was with Paul, who, in addition to this, was a boy not without imagination. As formerly drink-offerings were sent to emperors, so our mother was always received by her parents with sweet wine, and her son went with some of it in his head to Silberer, the hair-dresser. Here he had his head cooled from outside with the curling tongs, and the tight screwing of the curl-papers; and came back the cooler, fresher, and whiter with curls and crest, fresh out of the powder shower to dinner, which cannot have been a meal of much importance, as his grandfather had to hasten off very soon to sell his cloth bales in the townhall. At the evening meal, there was all the more time and abundance, as among the ancient Romans. The afternoon now offered excellent fun for Paul, who was freed from restraint, deafened and dazzled amid the variegated and noisy confusion of men and goods. Paul had his penny-piece of fair money from his grandmother in his pocket and could buy everything—he could carry his purchases home to the comfortless empty house, for all were out; gloomy and lonely, one was forced to go into the crowd again. The most distinguished and beautiful ladies up at the windows were gratis, and he fell in love on all sides, in walking past down below, and embraced them, as they did not know him, in the street; but not one of all these ladies, elevated by storeys or head-dresses, did he select as favourite sultana, but bought his almonds and raisins for the cow-maiden, Augustine. From six to half-past the noise and excitement grew greater under the evening rays, which gilded and beautified ever more and more both themselves and the people; but then I had to go home, there was no help for it, for our grandfather supped at seven o'clock after the market, and we all assembled then.

* Kirmess, Kirchmesse, or Kirchweihe, was originally the festivity at the consecration of a church. It took its origin from the Jewish festivity at the consecration of the temples, which always took place in November, and it is thus held in that month. In the ninth century it became an annual festivity to commemorate the anniversaries of the consecration.—T.R.

The supper we will not mention, for Paul tasted little of it—he had already eaten enough—but all the more gladly do I follow him again into the streets after the second grace, where he was as happy as any young soul escaped from a parsonage could be.

Rambling about in late twilight or early night intoxicates and inspires youth. It was at this hour that the Janisary band marched through the principal streets on market days, and the people and children swarmed after them, deafened and deafening; then for the first time the village boy heard the drums, fifes and cymbals. "In me"—these are his own words,—“who had a ceaseless yearning for the sound of music, it produced a complete music-intoxication, and I heard the world as the drunken man sees it—double and in motion. The fifes made the most impression on me with their high-pitched shrill melody. How often have not I tried to recall these tones before falling to sleep, at which time the imagination most easily finds the keys of lost tones, and how happy am I now when I hear them again; as deeply happy as if my old childhood, like a Tithonus, had become immortal in the tone, and spoke to me through it. Ah the small, faint, invisible tones contain whole worlds for the heart, they are souls for the soul." The notes of the higher octaves, perhaps strike more deeply. Engel affirms that all really harmonious tones lie between the low and the high, but poetical music may be said to lie beyond them. Down in the dark depths of the lowest bass notes slowly vibrates the dead past; the high pitch of the treble notes, on the other notes, cries out and pierces into the future, or calls to it by the sharpness and confinedness expressed in its tones. Thus in the Russian field-music, the high sharp whistling of the small fifes sounded almost dreadful; like a Bothmäus whistle calling to the slaughter, like a cruel preliminary Te Deum of coming bloodshed.

I fear people will talk in Germany and elsewhere, because I have reserved the autumn, as the highest Joditz Idyl; just the autumn which can lead to nothing else but snowy paths. But an imaginative being like Paul enjoys in autumn, not only the season itself, but also in anticipation, the winter with its homeliness, and the spring with its poetical pictures; while the spring, when it has come, passes immediately into the summer, and the summer is a centre, or halting point of the imagination, too near to the autumn and too far from the spring. Still, to this day he sees in autumn time, through the half-denuded trees, the snowy blossom-mountains far on in the coming year and visits them like a bee searching for honey; those mountains which melt on our approach; and in the autumn, too, are sketched out and enjoyed those plans for the yet distant spring-journeys and spring-pleasures: in the spring itself the chief part is already over. As the landscape painter prefers the autumn, so does the spiritual painter, the poet, at least in his old age.

But our hero had also a special reverse side in his character, which he turned towards the autumn, and this was that he had always had a singular liking for homely retired life and intellectual nest-making. He is a domestic snail, which loves to withdraw and make itself comfortable in the smallest corners of its dwelling, only he must always have his shell wide open, in order, not to raise his four feelers into the air like four butterfly wings, but to thrust them ten times farther up towards heaven, reaching at any rate with each feeler one of the four satellites of Jupiter. Of this foolish mingled longing for the near and the distant—like a telescope which by a turn magnifies either that which is near or far away—more will occur in our lectures than either I desire or the autumn alone can supply.

This domesticity showed itself already in the fancies of the boy; he thought the swallows happy because they could sit so snugly all night in their walled nests. When he climbed on the roof up to the large pigeon-house, he was quite at home in the room full of little rooms or pigeon holes, and the front was a miniature Louvre or Escorial to him. I fear that I shall hardly be forgiven, if I introduce the following childish triviality into my lecture; namely, that he made a complete flies' house, a country residence, properly speaking, out of clay. It was about as long and broad as a man's fist, and a little higher, and the whole was painted red, and divided into brick squares with ink; inside it was provided with two floors, and many stairs, landings, and rooms, and a spacious garret, while outside there were low windows and eaves, and a chimney, covered over at the top with a piece of glass, in order that the flies might not get out—instead of the smoke. Windows were nowhere spared and one might say, that the castle consisted more of window than of wall. Now when Paul saw his numberless flies running upstairs and downstairs, into all the large rooms of this vast castle, and into the tiny little windows, he pictured their domestic life to himself, and wished that he could walk with them on the windows, and fancied himself in the position of the inhabitants who, from the largest rooms could betake themselves to the prettiest and tiniest of parlours, and bow-windows. How small and insignificant must the parsonage have appeared to him in comparison

In later years, too, as author, he showed in Wutz, Fixlein, and Fibel, this house-and-corner-loving disposition, and still, as man, he looks with longing eyes at every little slate-covered house with two stories and flowers before the windows, and a little garden in front which one can water from the window; the good domestic fool can sit quite contentedly in a close carriage and look round at the side-pockets and say, "A beautiful quiet little fireproof room, this! and out there are the big villages and gardens driving past." So much is certain, that he could write just as little as he could live in a baron's hall or a St. Peter's Church—to him it would be a market-place covered with a roof, while on the other hand he would be quite capable of living and writing continually on Mont Blanc or Ætna, if the wherewithal was provided for him there; only the limited and human can never be small enough for him, the greatness of Nature cannot be too much enlarged; the smallness of man's works is made smaller by enlargement.

By what I have now said the Joditz autumn Idyl is pretty well painted. The autumn leads people homewards, and there leaves them its horn of plenty for the winter's nest, which they build, like the crossbill, who makes her nest and hatches her young in the month of ice. It must be on account of that time that Paul still hears with pleasure the first threshing, or the noisy flocks of crows in the woods, and the calling and signalling of the birds of passage before their departure, as the preludes to a cosy homely winter nesting; and I am sorry for his sake that in the autumn, when the geese are flying in flocks, he hears them with real pleasure cackling as the foretellers of the winter-time. By this homely and wintry disposition I have always accounted for the unusual enjoyment with which he read all descriptions of travels in wintry countries, as Spitzbergen or Greenland, for the representation on paper merely of distress can scarcely be an explanation of his pleasure, because if it were so, he would have had the same feelings on reading of the distresses in the hot countries. The well-known pleasure, on the other hand, which one feels over each quarter of an hour by which the days are diminished in autumn may, I think, be attributed more to the liking for superlatives—even though they be the antipodes of one another—the liking for what is infinitely great or infinitely small, in short for the Maxima and Minima, and this the more so, as he had just as much pleasure when the days were increasing in length; then he had no other wish than for long Swedish days. One sees from all with what economy and skill God has armed and equipped man for the path of life, on which there is little to be found either on the right or left, so that however black it may be around him, he can always find some white in it, and with an amphibious instinct for land and water can neither drown nor thirst.

It is just these autobiographical features, gentlemen, which a future biographer will easily work up into a life and for which he will perhaps thank me. I know besides of nothing but this home-and-winter-loving disposition which can make intelligible to me why Paul tastes again with so much relish another autumn pleasure, very insipid in itself. In the autumn evenings (the gloomy ones, too), my father, in dressing gown, used to take Paul and Adam to the potato field, lying above the Saale. One youngster carried the hoe and the other a hand basket. When we arrived on the field our father dug up as many new potatoes as were wanted for supper, Paul picking them up and throwing them into the basket, while Adam was allowed to climb the hazel bushes after the nuts. After a little time he had to come down to the potato-bed, and Paul in his turn climbed up. And then they went happily home with potatoes and nuts,—and I will let each one paint for himself as brilliantly as the partaker himself, the joy of a quarter of a mile walk, and an hour's run in the open air, and of the return home and celebration of the harvest festival by candlelight.

Two other autumn flowers of joy which have been preserved in the store-room of his memory are still particularly fresh and green, and they are both trees. The one is a thick tall muscatel pear-tree in the parsonage yard, the fall of whose fruit we children endeavoured to hasten all the autumn by artificial means, until at length on the most important day of the season our father himself climbed by a ladder into the forbidden tree, and brought down a sweet paradise for the whole house and for the oven. The other tree, always green and always blooming more beautifully still than the former, is, however, smaller than it. It is the felled birch-tree which every year, on St. Andrew's Eve, was dragged trunk first into the room by the old woodcutter, and planted in a large flower-pot in lime-and-water, so that the green leaves might be ready just at Christmas-time, when the golden fruits were hung upon it. This birch-tree (it was no mourning but a rejoicing birch) had the peculiarity that it strewed the dark December road up to Christmas with flowers of joy, namely with the little forced leaves, each fresh one of which pointed like a watch-hand to another day left behind; and that each child could celebrate (under this winter May-tree) its Tabernacle feast of hope.

All will willingly exempt me from a description of Paul's Christmas Festival who have met with pictures of it in his works, which I least of anyone am able to surpass. Two additions only may here be made to the picture. When Paul on Christmas morning stood before the lighted tree, and the new world of gold, glitter, and gifts lay in front of him, and he found and received one new and costly present after another,—not a tear—namely, of joy, but a sigh,—namely, over life—was what first arose in him; in one word the step, or spring, or flight, out of the swelling, sporting, boundless sea of imagination on to the limited, limiting, immovable shore expressed itself in the boy by a sigh for a larger, more beautiful land. But ere this sigh was breathed forth and the happy reality had asserted its strength, Paul felt that out of gratitude he must show himself happy before his mother, and so put on the appearance; only for a short time however, for the rays of the breaking morning of reality immediately extinguished and dispersed the moonlight of fancy.

Here, too, may be mentioned a peculiarity of my father's which was shown just at the same time. It was this. My father, who took part so joyfully in everything, permitting and giving every pleasure so willingly, came down from his room on Christmas morning into the gaily lighted parlour, as if decked in mourning crape. Our mother assured us of her own ignorance of the cause of this annual melancholy, and no one had the courage to ask. To our mother, too, he left the whole of the trouble and pleasure of decking the table on Christmas Eve, and in this respect perhaps he remained considerably behind his son Paul, who always helped his wife,—if it was not she who only helped him,—at the children's Christmas play; for in fact—particularly in their earlier years, when they were more foolish—for many months before the performance of this fairy play, he had acted the False Informer, the Playwriter, and the Scene Painter on the sofa, and at length on the evening had appeared as complete Opera Director and practical Manager—and for each of his three children he had carefully marked off a portion of the table by lights, the presents for the maid being placed on a side table, in fact he had laid out and arranged everything on table and tree so brightly and with such judgment that the whole scene sparkled, as did his own eyes.

In spite of this, the father and the father's sadness are to be explained from the son, and in this way; the latter himself with all his outward activity has had for many years to veil a similar feeling. In both cases it is only a melancholy feeling, tender from church chants and novels, which comes with the comparison of the mature autumn of reality with the spring of childhood before one's eyes, in which the blossoms of the ideal grow directly on the stem of the real without the intervention of leaves and branches.

The wine and honey of childish joy required then even the ideal, ethereal addition of a belief in the Holy Child who gave them. For as soon as Paul had seen with his own eyes that they were only people, not supernatural beings, who had gathered the flowers and fruits and placed them on the table; the Eden fragrance and Eden splendour were gone, brushed away, and the every-day flower bed was there. It is too incredible how, like all children, he defended himself against every assaulter of his heavenly faith, and how long he held to his supernatural revelations against all the enlightenment of his increasing years, against all the hints of fortune, until at last he saw and conquered, less than he was conquered. So difficult is it for people of all religions to bring down to humanity those who, in their fancied heaven, play the part of beneficent deities to them.

Thus far the Joditz Idyls extend; they lasted long enough for parents and children, namely, as long as the Trojan War. The expenses for the four sons were increasing and the promised school became more and more necessary for them. At times, too, a feeling of dissatisfaction came over our father that he was exhausting and using up his best years and best strength in such a small village church. At length Barnikel, the pastor of Schwarzenbach-on-the-Saale, a small city or large market town, died. Death is the real play director and manager of the world. He takes a man like a cipher from the row of figures, from the beginning, the middle or the end, and, lo, the whole row closes up with new positions and values. The living, which was in the gift of the Count von Schönburg-Waldenburg and the Baroness von Plotho by turns, fell this time to Richter's patroness, who had long and openly looked forward to this opportunity of helping and rewarding the good, cheerful, disinterested, and impoverished pastor.

But he went not more but rather less often to Zedtwitz on this account. To send a written petition or even so much as a verbal request for a pastorship would have stained him as an act of simony, believing orthodoxly as he did that the Holy Ghost alone must call one to a sacred office. And thus the birth-proud patroness had to give way to the firm, poor, and office-proud Blackcoat without request or solicitation. I am letting you into a secret of the Joditz Court—which it has itself long since forgotten—when I relate from the lips of the old pastor that which happened on the day of his appointment. He was as usual shown in at first to the old Herr von Plotho, and he for love and joy could not keep back from my father the news of his good fortune, but told him straight out, and even gave him the presentation, while properly his wife as the real patroness was alone able to do so. Afterwards, when the newly created pastor came to her to present his thanks there was a little ill-temper on the part of the baroness towards her husband which she could not wholly conceal from the Court. Both with similar intention had wished, by delivering the presentation personally, to spare their moneyless friend all the various gratuities and douceurs—fatal words for one party concerned—of the messengers.

As I know so well your benevolent disposition towards father and son, I would guess that you are now inwardly exclaiming with joy, "This is indeed glorious, that the moon-change of the parsonages at last brings him finer weather, and we now see the glad musician duly leaving the company earlier than usual (he would gladly have talked longer with them out of gratitude) and hurrying home with his bulldog, to tell and share his own delight as soon as possible with all his family, and particularly with his poor wife, who of a truth, has already endured enough in the ear-gleaning and tithe-collecting on the paternal fields."

I have nothing to say against this, except that you are all very wide of the mark and I am surprized at your mistake. He brought the glad tidings seriously and sadly not only because on the flower-and-fruit-wreath of good fortune, as on the bridal wreath, a few dew-drops always hang, looking like tears, but also because the departure from his loved and loving parish, which for many years had been his second family in the larger family hall of the church began to shed tears, and lastly, too, because now the quiet, peaceful, sequestered, simple village-life would hang in his memory only as a distant picture. Country-life, like sea-life, is indeed monotonous, without variety of small or great events; but there is a kind of uniform joy, which strengthens, just as the monotonous sea air strengthens the consumptive patient because there are no dust clouds to inhale, and no insects which torment.

I think that I have now so far fulfilled my obligations as my own historical Professor, in all that concerns Joditz, the village of my education, that in my next lecture I may move with my hero and his family to Schwarzenbach-on-the-Saale, where undoubtedly the curtain goes up a few feet higher, and rather more of the chief actor comes in view than merely the child's shoes, as hitherto. For indeed we send him from to-day's lecture into the next, as a human being of upwards of twelve years of age with ten times less knowledge than the five-year-old Christian Heinrich Heineke von Lübeck,* whose nurse laid him again to her breast after his examination,—so ignorant of all natural, or geographical, or world history, except of that little part which he himself was—so ignorant of French and music; in Latin provided with just a little bit of Lange and Speccius—in short, such an empty, transparent skeleton or framework, with no nourishment or flesh of learning, that, with you all, I can hardly await the place and time when, in Schwarzenbach-on-the-Saale, he must at length begin to know something, and clothe his skeleton with flesh.

With him we now leave that unknown little village; although it has not, like many another village, put on a laurel crown won in war, yet still, I think, he can give it a high place in his heart and say, even to-day, as if he was just leaving it—"Loved little village, thou art still dear and precious to me. • Two little sisters have I left in thy bosom. My father contentedly spent in thee his fairest Sundays; and in the morning of life I have seen the radiance of thy meadows. Truly thy well-known inhabitants, whom I will now thank, are long since gone like my father, but for their unknown children and grandchildren, my heart's wish is that they may be prosperous and that warfare may pass by them at a distance."

* Christian von Schöneich, the tutor and biographer of this prodigy who was born February 6th, 1721, tells us (1726), in his 'Life, Deeds, Journeys, and Death,' that he understood Latin, French, History, Geography, and the Institutions of the Roman Law, that he was well-informed in Theology and Anatomy, was witty and acute in mind, and was nourished entirely by the milk of his nurse.

THIRD LECTURE (WITH THREE SUPPLEMENTS).

SCHWARZENBACH-ON-THE-SAALE—KISS—RECTOR—LORD'S SUPPER.

Would you believe, my friends, that Paul retained nothing in his memory of all the packing-up, moving, and leaving; no parting either of parents or children; no object on the two-miles journey, excepting only the above-mentioned tailor's son, to whose pocket he intrusted his six drawings of the kings for his beloved? But so it is in childhood and boyhood; the most trivial is retained, the most important forgotten; one knows not why, in either case. Childhood, too, ever restless and impatient, remembers the departure less than the arrival; a child leaves ten times more easily the long-accustomed surroundings than the more recent ones; only in manhood does the exact opposite become the case. For children there are no partings, for they acknowledge no past, but only a present filled with the future.

Schwarzenbach-on-the-Saale was indeed in the possession of many things. A pastor and a curate; a rector and a cantor; and a parsonage with many little rooms and two big ones. Opposite were two large bridges and the accompanying Saale, and close by was the schoolhouse, as big as (if not bigger than) the whole Joditz parsonage, and among the houses was also a townhall—not to mention the large empty castle.

A new rector entered on his office just at the same time as my father; Werner from Merseburg, a handsome man with broad brow and high nose; full of fire, and with much feeling; of overwhelming natural eloquence, replete with questions, allegories and harangues, like Father Abraham, but quite without depth either in languages or other branches of knowledge. He helped out the poverty of this reverse side, however, by a heart full of enthusiasm and zeal; his tongue was the lever of our childish minds.

His plan of teaching was to let one learn from the grammar only the most necessary forms of inflexion—by this he understood only the declensions and conjugations—and then to spring at once to the reading of some author.

Paul had to make the spring at once, far over Lange's 'Colloquia,' into 'Cornelius' and it was successful.

The schoolroom, or much more the school-ark, contained A, B, C students, young spellers, Latin learners, big and little girls—who sat in tiers from the floor up to the wall, as if on the shelves of a greenhouse or in an old Roman theatre—and the rector and cantor, together with all the accompanying crying, buzzing, reading and whipping. The Latin learners formed, as it were, a school within the school. Soon after Latin, the Greek grammar also was commenced, by learning the declensions and the most necessary verbs, and then without further delay we were translated to the translation of the New Testament. Werner, who often in the warmth of speaking praised himself so much that he was astonished at his own greatness, thought this faulty method of his was original, but in reality it was only that of Basedow. Paul's winged progress was a fresh proof to him of its success. About a year later a few declensions and verbs from Danze's Hebrew Grammar, written in Latin, were put together to form a boat-bridge to the First Book of Moses, the beginning of which—just the exegesis threshold of young Hebraists—was not permitted to be read by the uncultivated Jews.

I will immediately proceed chronologically with the life of our hero when I have cast a cursory view forward, just for one moment, and have shown you how much he suddenly could and had to do.

I will then become statary again immediately.

He had to translate the Greek and Hebrew Testaments viva voce into Latin like a Vulgate maker. During his translation lesson (he was the only Hebrew scholar in the school), the rector had a printed translation lying by his side. When our hero was not successful in the analysis of the words, a second misfortune often occurred, namely, the master was no better off.

The present writer of novels was regularly in love with the Hebrew grammatical and analytical trash and trifling—this too was in reality a secret indication of his love of domesticity—and borrowed Hebrew grammars from all corners of Schwarzenbach, in order to hoard up all the information on diacritical points, vowels, accents, and so on, which could be served up in the analysis of each single word. Then he sewed himself a quarto book together, and began in it with the first word of the first verse of the First Book of Moses, and wrote several pages of such copious information from all the borrowed grammars about its few letters, its vowels and the first Dagesh and Sheva, that at the first words “In the beginning,” (he intended to continue thus from chapter to chapter), he also made an end, unless indeed it was with the next. What has been written (in the first Letter-box), about Quintus Fixlein’s chase in a folio Hebrew Bible after larger, smaller, and reversed letters applies literally in all particulars to Paul’s own life.

In just as droll a fashion he treated the now superannuated Hofmann, who, with the German translation sentences or Latin-rule examples was a great cross Speccius for the scholars, by winding his way like a screw,—the man going deeper and deeper into Syntaxis Ornata,—into such endless participial straits that the good rector had to think more about understanding than correcting him.

Immediately after coming to Schwarzenbach—I am still in the cursory—I had pianoforte lessons from Gressel the Cantor; and here, too, when he had learnt a few dance tunes and the usual choral chords and General Bass notation,—would God but give the poor boy for once a thorough teacher, is my wish, however little prospect there appears to be anywhere of that,—he fell into his self-absolution from instruction, into extemporizing on the piano and collecting and playing off all the pieces which were to be found anywhere in the place. Thorough bass, the grammar of music, he acquired by continual extemporizing and playing from sight, in much the same way as we acquire the German grammár by talking.

At this time, too, he applied himself to the reading of German literature, but as there was none other to be had in Schwarzenbach than the romantic type, and of this only the worthless novels of the first half of the last century, he built himself a small Babylonian tower out of these bricks, though he could only extract from it one brick at a time to read. But of all histories standing on bookshelves, not one—for Schiller's 'Armenians' later produced only half the impression—poured such oil of joy and nectar through all the veins of his being,—even to bodily ecstasy,—as old 'Robinson Crusoe'; he still remembers hour and spot, (it was evening, by the window, looking on to the bridge) when the ecstasy occurred; and only after some time did a second novel, 'Veit Rosenstock,' by Otto—read and forbidden by my father—repeat the half of this enthusiasm. Only as plagiarist and book-thief did he enjoy it from his father's study so long as his father was not there—once he read it lying on his stomach in the empty gallery during one of his father's week-day sermons. I little envy children now-a-days, to whom the first impression of the childlike and childish Robinson is denied and compensated for by the modern remodellers of the man, who metamorphose the quiet island into a lecture room or a worn-out snipe valley, and send the shipwrecked Robinson about with a precept book in his hand and their own dictata in his mouth, that in every nook he may found a private academy for the young, although he has so much to do for himself that it is only with the greatest difficulty that he can keep his own life.

At this time, that is, just after this, the young curate Völkel begged the lad's father to let him come for two hours every day after dinner in order to instil into him a little of all sorts from philosophy and geography. By what means I, with my village awkwardness, became of such value to him, who was not fired with any particular pedagogic talent, that he sacrificed his napping hour for me, I do not know.

In philosophy, he read, or more properly I read to him, that of Gottsched, which, with all its dryness and barrenness, refreshed me like fresh water with its novelty. Then he showed me a number of towns and frontiers on a map—of Germany I believe; but how much of this I retained I do not know, and search in vain for it in my memory to this day ; I dare aver—what of a truth sounds strong—that I, of all living authors am perhaps the one who knows the least about geographical maps. An atlas of maps would bear for me a hell instead of the mythological heaven, if I had to carry them in my head. Whatever of the geography of towns and countries may by chance remain hanging in it (the head) is the little which has flown against it on the way, on the geographical instruction courses, which, to express myself in good high-school German, partly the post-chaises staterically, and partly the Hauderer (coachman) cursorily, have taken with me.

All the more do I thank the good curate for his instruction in German composition, which consisted of nothing but instruction in so-called theology. He set me for instance to give the evidence without a Bible, of the existence of a God or a Providence, &c. To do this I received an octavo sheet, on which were written the proofs and suggestions taken from Nösselt, 'Jerusalem,' and others, in incomplete sentences, even in single words separated by dashes. The disguised suggestions were then explained to me, and from this leaf, in accordance with Goethe's botanical theory, were my leaves developed. I began each composition with warmth, and finished it in a glow, for at the end there came always the end of the world, of life, 'the joys of heaven, and all that superabundance which bursts from the young vine-shoots in the warmth of spring, and which only in autumn attains any intellectual value. To whom belong the praise and merit that these writing hours were not hours of toil, but of pleasure and freedom, if not to him who chose the right blossoming and fruit-bearing themes? For, let anyone consider a moment and compare these suggestive and satisfying exercises with those ordinarily set by schoolmasters, which are so wide and undefined, so uncongenial to the young heart, or which reach so far beyond the sphere of youthful life—in jest I should like to give you a thousand in a note *—that I wish seriously that some man with leisure and a knowledge of youth would sit himself down, in spite of all the beautiful thoughts and elaborations which he might otherwise produce, and would write nothing for the present but a small volume of prize subjects, arranged after the pattern of the innumerable dissertations on the Sunday texts, for teachers, whose sole work would be to choose among them those which they would give to their pupils.

* Out of such universal, cold, empty subjects, demanding everything and nothing,—for example, "Praise of Industry," "Importance of Youth," the richest, maturest head could hardly hatch anything living. Other subjects again, too broad, as "Comparison of the Heroes of

Better perhaps than all subjects are none at all. Let the youth choose each time that subject, as a mistress, for which his heart is warm and full, and with which alone he is able to create that which has life. Leave the young spirit free with a few hours and a few sheets of paper—which maturer writers require too—that he may freely give forth his tones undisturbed by your hand, otherwise he is a bell standing firmly on the ground and unable to sound until hung freely in the air.

But men are thus throughout all offices up from the lowest; they find the greater glory in making servile machines out of free spirits, thus showing their creating, governing, and producing powers; they think to give proof of this, if they are able to bring into the same track and couple on to the intellectual machine next above them an intermediate midway machine, and to the intermediate one to couple another, until at length there appears another Marionette leading a Marionette daughter, who again in her turn is able to carry a poodle—all is only a coupling together by the same machine master—God; the free will only rear the free; the devil, the unfree, will rear only his like.

I would not exchange my weekly exercises for any of those of the present time, how much soever these may enlighten the world, particularly as the subjects opened the lists to my philosophizing tendency and let it have its run out; a tendency which had already sought to overflow from my small head into a thin octavo booklet in which

Antiquity," "Weighing of the Old Forms of Religion," are ostrich-eggs on which the pupil with too short wings sits and broods in vain, making none warm but himself. Between these two kinds are the better ones, rich in sensuous and historical material, such as "Description of a Conflagration, of the Last Day, of the Deluge; Proof of its Non-universality."

Seeing and Hearing endeavoured and thought to give a logical account of themselves, and of which I related a part to my father, who blamed and misunderstood me just as little as I did myself. Can one, then, repeat too often to the teacher of youth—very often must I have said it already—that all hearing and reading does not strengthen and stimulate the spirit half so much as writing and speaking, because the former, like conception in the female, exercises only the receptive faculties, while the latter like begetting in the male, demands and brings into action the creative powers. Do not the translators of the most learned and pithy writers,—for example, Ebert, the translator of Young,—keep on all their lives writing their prefaces, notes and poems with inborn washiness, when one might have expected a little improvement, since of all reading translating is the most repeated as well as the most accurate and penetrating, and thus the translator of a work of merit enjoys it more and gets at the kernel better than any other reader.

Reading is like collecting for the school money-box or the poor-bag; writing is the founding of a mint, the stamping die enriches one more than the bell-bag. Writing, like a Socratic midwifery which one practises on oneself, is to reading as speaking is to hearing. In England and among people of the court and world, talking is a means of education, and helps out the paucity of the reading.

Finally I staked these lessons with the curate on a game at chess and lost, because—we did not play. To explain; the curate would sometimes conclude the lesson in geography with one in chess, still to this day my favourite game, though in it and all games I have remained the beginner that I was when I first made my débüt. Once I went to my lesson in spite of a headache, because a game at chess had been promised, and as, through forgetfulness, the game never came, so I also never came again. That my father silently allowed this desertion of mine unoccasioned by one single word, is more difficult of comprehension to me than the other natural circumstance that I was a fool and fled from the curate at the same time that I continued to love him. I was still very pleased to act the little foot-messenger between him and my father, and with glances of love and joyfully beating pulses would see him turn into our house after almost all the baptisms (for this reason the baptism bell tolled a joyous mass on my ears) to chat away a half or the whole of the evening while I read or worked at the table; but, as I have said, I had got the chessboard in my head, and kept away. Heavens! who is it that gathers into the best honey cells of mine and of many another poetical and feminine nature such a summer honey (if not honey vinegar) of love and ill-will, such a conflicting mish-mash, which often poisons and cankers the most beautiful days, yes, and the most beautiful hearts, perhaps? Truly, could one often but add an additional half grain of brain-æther or reason to the warmest hearts, I should know of nothing better than the hottest love, but, as it is, the sweetness congeals to bitter lees and its own reverse.

Kiss.

As I lost my heart before in a church pew, so now I could not do otherwise than fall in love up the raised school benches—for she sat quite up at the top, Katherine Bärin—with her dainty, round, red, little, small-pox-marked face and sparkling eyes, and the pretty haste with which she spoke and ran off. At the school carnival, which occupied the whole of the forenoon of Shrove Tuesday, and consisted in dancing and playing, I had the pleasure of dancing the irregular hop-dance and thus, as it were, of practising and dancing beforehand the regular dance. Yes, too, at the game of “How do you like your neighbour?” where, on a favourable answer one is ordered to kiss, and on an unfavourable one to run off, amid accolades from the knotted handkerchief, and make place for others, I carried off plenty of the latter; a gold-beating, by which my love, like pure gold, increased, and an entertaining variety always prevailed, as she invariably forbid me the court, and I always called her to it.

All these malicious desertions (desertiones malitiosæ) could not deprive me of the bliss of seeing her every day, as, with little white apron and cap, she ran over the long bridge towards the parsonage, where I was at the window looking out. To catch her and not so much to say as to give to her something sweet, a mouthful of fruit for example, this, as far as I know I was never able to do; let me run as quickly as I would through the yard and down the few steps to receive her in her flight past. But I enjoyed enough in being able to love her on the bridge from the window, which, I think, was near enough for me who usually stood with heart and mouth behind long seeing- and hearing-trumpets. Distance is less harmful to true love than proximity; if I had got a sight of Venus in the planet Venus, I should have loved the heavenly being ardently, particularly as at such a distance she would be very bewitching with her charms, and I would have chosen it without hesitation to be revered as my morning and evening star.

I now have the pleasure of freeing from their error all those who expect a mere repetition of the Joditz love affair in the Schwarzenbach one; and of announcing to them that I brought it to something. One winter evening when I had already provided my princess-tax of sweet gifts, which usually lacked only the recipient, the pastor's son, who was the worst boy among all my school companions, persuaded me to a forbidden deed of daring. While a call from the curate occupied my father, I left the parsonage in the dark, crossed the bridge (which I had never dared before) went straight up to the house where the beloved one lived with her poor mother in a little corner-room, and there made my way into a kind of tap-room down below. Whether Katherine was down there by chance and was going upstairs again, or whether the rogue with his officious planning had enticed her half-way down under some pretence or other, in short, how it happened that I found her on the stairs, has all become a dreamy recollection to me, for a Present, which flashes forth suddenly, renders dim in the memory all that has preceded it. Hurriedly as a thief, I first gave her my food-presents, and then I, who never in Joditz could come to the heaven of a first kiss, and never dared to touch the beloved hand, for the first time pressed a long-loved being to my heart and lips. I know not what more to say; it was a single pearly minute, which had never been before, and never came again ; a whole longing past and a future dream were compressed into one moment : and in the darkness behind my closed eyes the firework of life was displayed for one moment and then was gone.

Like a clairvoyant, I return from heaven back again to earth, remarking only that the Ruprecht followed, since he had not preceded, this second Christmas festivity, for on my way home, I already found the messenger, and was soundly scolded when I got there for running out. Such a hailstorm and dross-stream fall usually with the hot silver beams of the sun of happiness. What did it matter to me ? The stream of words could not mar my paradise, for does it not bloom to this very day, even to this pen and forth from it ?

It was, as I have said, the first kiss, and at the same time, I believe, the last, unless,—for she still lives,—I purposely make a journey to Schwarzenbach and give her a second. As usual, I contented myself throughout my Schwarzenbach life with my telegraphic love, which, too, had to sustain and reply to itself without an answering telegraph.

But truly none blames the good maiden less than I do that she then kept silence and does so still—after her husband's death ; for in later life I have always had to find my way slowly to the unknown heart and its love ; it was of no use that I immediately stood there with ready face and exterior ; afterwards I always had to underlay these bodily charms with the intellectual for them sufficiently to glitter, dazzle, and kindle the fire.

But this was just the defect in my innocent love time, that, without intercourse with the loved one, without conversation or prelude, I suddenly, with barren exterior, showed the whole of my love bursting forth, in short, that I stood before her like the Judas-tree which produces its blossoms without the intervention of branches and leaves.

JOKE WITH THE RECTOR.

As the Joke-playing Society* knew that the rector read the newspaper in school, and introduced the current events in his school sermons, they sent him an old number of the Erlanger Realzeitung, which he took in, containing an account of the horrors of the terrible famine in Italy, particularly in Naples. The date they had covered up well enough by dropping an ink blot on it. All heard into their rooms how, inflamed by the Fidibus paper† (scarcely could he await the withdrawal of the organist), he burst forth with his exposition, and how vividly he brought before the eyes of the Schwarzenbach youth in fire colours—the Erlanger writer gave only the water colours—the begging, shrieking, fainting, and starving in all the streets, until it became doubtful whether they would return home with more burning tears or hunger. And in reality in such descriptions one hardly believes that there is still anything left to eat on the earth. Each one may imagine for himself under what kind of triumphal gates (or on what triumphal beds) the good herald of hunger was taken that evening by the Joke-playing Society for his touching and warning words, when they had seen the children and questioned them about it. I can give no account, for I heard only dimly and some time afterwards of the recall of the paper. Good, well-meaning old rector! be not much ashamed or angry with birds of joke or prey, who wish to pounce down on your pulpit-doves! The holy dove had still hovered and brooded over our hearts with warm wings. For the warmed heart it is just the same whether it has trembled with the pulses of compassion for a near or a distant famine.

* This society consisted of the friends of the rector who permitted such jokes between themselves as the one here related.

† Properly a small strip of paper used for lighting cigars, &c.

THE LORD'S SUPPER.

The Lord's Supper is considered in the country, or more properly among good Christians, not merely as a Christian moral toga virilis; not as in towns amongst girls, less as the putting on the nun's clothing, than the young lady's; but it is the highest and first spiritual act, the entrance on citizenship in God's city. It is only now that the former water-baptism becomes a real fire-baptism, the first sacrament rises again in the second glorified and more living. The children of a pastor, who have been eye- and ear-witnesses of the preparation of others so often for this Sunday approach it with the greater reverence. This reverence rose still higher in me on account of the postponement of the ceremony for a year, as my father did not consider that the legal age of twelve years had completely elapsed by the 21st of March.

Add now to these days of religious warmth, a fire-preacher, as was our rector, who presented to our souls the awful conditions peculiar to this religious act; that the unrepentant who partakes of the sacrament, like a perjurer, eats his Hell instead of Heaven, and that when a Redeemer and Saint enters into the impure sinner, the saving power of his presence must be turned into a poisoning power. Warm tears, which he, too, shed with us, were the least which his heartfelt words drew forth from myself and the rest; burning repentance for the past and passionate vows for a blameless future filled our breasts and continued their work there after he had ceased to speak. How often did I go to the garret before the Confession Saturday, and kneel down to repent and atone. And how sweet it was on the Confession day itself to ask forgiveness with stammering lips and overflowing heart for one's faults from all the dear ones, parents, and teachers, and thus to atone for them and absolve oneself.

On this evening there came, too, a mild, light, clear heaven of peace over my soul, an unutterable never-returning blessedness in feeling myself quite clean, purified and freed from sin; in having made with God and man a joyful far-reaching peace, and still, from these evening hours of mild and warm soul-rest, I looked onward to the heavenly enthusiasm and rapture at the altar next morning.

O blessed time! when one has stripped off the unclean past, and stands pure and white, free and fresh in the present, and thus steps forth courageously into the future. But to whom but children can this time return? In the happy time of childhood this complete peace of soul is more easy to gain, because the circle of sacrifices which it demands is smaller and the sacrifices themselves less important, while the complicated and widened circumstances of later years, either through deficiencies or delay in complete resignation, admit the heavenly rainbow of peace only incomplete and not rounded to a perfect circle, as in the time of youth. In the twelfth year enthusiasm can render one perfectly pure, but not so in age. The youth, too, and the maiden with all their fiery impulses have less to overcome in their circle, and have an easier and shorter way to the highest moral purity, than that which the man or woman have to traverse with their colder and more selfish strivings, through the wilderness of troubles, cares, and toils. The true man is, at some period in his earliest time, a diamond of the first water, crystal clear, and without colour, then he becomes one of second quality and glitters with many colours, until at last he darkens into a coloured stone.

On Sunday morning the boys and girls, adorned for the sacrificial altar, met at the parsonage for the solemn entrance into the church amid singing and bell-ringing. All this, together with the festive attire and the nosegays, and the darkened fragrant birch-trees, both at home and in the church, became for the young soul a powerful breeze in its outspread wings, which were already raised and in motion. Even during the long sermon the heart expanded with its fire, and inward struggles were carried on against all thoughts which were worldly or not sufficiently holy.

At length I received the bread from my father and the cup from my purely loved teacher, but the ceremony did not receive any additional value from the thought of what these two were to me; my heart and mind and soul were devoted alone to heaven, to happiness, and to the reception of the Most Holy, which was to unite itself with my being, and my rapture rose to a physical lightning-feeling of miraculous union.

I thus left the altar with a clear blue infinite heaven in my heart; this heaven revealed itself to me by an unlimited, stainless tender love which I now felt for all, all mankind. To this day I have preserved within my heart with loving and youthful freshness the remembrance of the happiness when I looked on the church members with love, and took them all to my innermost heart. The maiden companions at the holy altar with their bridal wreaths became not only dearer, but also more holy, to me as the brides of Christ, and I included them all in such a wide, pure love, that even my beloved Katharina as far as I can remember was not otherwise loved than the rest.

The whole earth remained for me throughout the day an unlimited love-repast, and the whole tissue and web of life appeared to me to be an Æolian or ætherial harp played by the breath of love. When even the misanthrope can extract an artificial delight from his universal dislike, of what indescribably sweet happiness must be a universal love for all hearts in the beautiful time of youth, untrammelled and untainted by circumstances, the horizon of which is still limited, the arms short but the ardour so much the more intense. And shall we not allow ourselves the joy of dreaming out the dream of this overflowing heaven, which would receive us if, in a higher and hotter focus of a second youth, we should grasp a larger spiritual world, loving with higher power, and should widen the heart from life to life for the All.

But in inconstant man all else remains more easily on the surface than the purest and the best, as in quicksilver all metals remain at the top—the gold alone sinks. Life, like the sun (according to Goethe), admits no white. After a few days this precious consciousness of innocence deserted me, for I thought that I had sinned in throwing a stone and wrestling with a schoolfellow, though I did neither out of ill-feeling, but in harmless love of play. But eternal thanks are due for ever to the all-kind spirit.

Every holiday is followed by working days, but we go into them newly-clad, and the past holiday leads us on over them to a fresh one. This spring festivity of the heart returned later in the years of youth, but only as a quiet, serene sabbath, when for the first time the great old stoical spirits of Plutarch, Epictetus, and Antoninus arose and appeared before me, and freed me from all the pains of this earth and all anger; but from this one Sabbath I hope I have gathered together a whole year of Sabbaths, or am able to make up that which may still be wanting.

LEVANA ;
OR,
THE DOCTRINE OF EDUCATION.

Dedicated

TO HER MAJESTY,

CAROLINE, QUEEN OF BAVARIA,

WITH

THE PROFOUNDEST RESPECT OF

THE AUTHOR.

MOST GRACIOUS QUEEN !

THE author would consecrate LEVANA to mothers by your royal name—as the banners which a princess has worked receive fresh victorious power.

Your Majesty will graciously pardon the dedication of a work which Germany, by the approbation expressed in the demand for a new, improved edition, has already dedicated to a Princess, who, in its best parts, will but find her own recollections.

If, even in the lowest ranks, a mother's heart be woman's honour,—the sun which gently warms and dries the dewdrops of early tears,—this sun delights the beholder most when it stands highest and cherishes the distant future, and when a noble mother multiplies her heart as well as her beauty, and blesses distant ages and countries with her image.

.This delight becomes still greater if the mother be also the mother of her country, and raise her sceptre like a magic wand which converts tears of sorrow into tears of joy ere it dries them.

Should the profound respect of a subject forbid him to express this joy in a dedication?

With most profound respect,

Your Majesty's

Most obedient, humble servant,

JEAN PAUL FR. RICHTER.

AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

NOVERRE only required from a good director of the ballet—besides the art of dancing—geometry, music, poetry, painting, and anatomy. But to write upon education, means to write upon almost everything at once; for it has to care for and watch over the development of an entire, though miniature, world in little—a microcosm of the microcosm. All the energies with which nations have laboured and signalized themselves once existed as germs in the hand of the educator. If we carried the subject still farther every century, every nation, and even every boy and every girl, would require a distinct system of education, a different primer, and domestic French governess, &c.

If, consequently, on a subject like this, only acta sanctorum, or more correctly, sanctificandorum (acts less of saints than of those to be made saints) can be written, and if a folio be nothing more than a fragment, there cannot be, on such an inexhaustible subject, one book too much, even after the best, except the worst; and where fragments alone are possible, all that are possible complete the whole.

The Author trusts thus to excuse his boldness as well as his poverty; for both, as in the state, are nearly connected. He has not read every thing which has been written upon education, but here and there something. First and last he names Rousseau's EMILE. No preceding work can be compared with his; the succeeding imitators and transcribers seem to resemble him more. Not Rousseau's individual rules, many of which may be erroneous without injury to the whole, but the spirit of education which fills and animates the work has shaken to their foundations and purified all the school-rooms and even the nurseries in Europe. In no previous work on education was the ideal so richly and beautifully combined with actual observation as in his. He was a man, could therefore easily become a child, and so he manifested and saved the nature of children. Basedow was his intelligent translator and publisher in Germany—this land of pedagogopædists (of education of children's educators) and of love of children—and Pestalozzi is now confirming Rousseau among the people.

Individual rules, without the spirit of education, resemble a dictionary without a grammar of the language. A book of rules is not merely incapable of exhausting and distinguishing the infinite variety of individual dispositions and circumstances; but, even granting it were perfect itself and able to make others perfect, it yet would but be like a system of remedies labouring to counteract some one symptom of a disease; recommending, for instance, something of a reducing nature to be taken before fainting, and to prevent tingling in the ears and unnatural brilliancy of eye; a tonic to cure paleness and coldness of the face; an aperient for nausea. But this is worthless! Do not, like common cultivators, water the individual branches, but the roots, and they will moisten and unfold the rest. Wisdom and morality are no ants' colonies of separate, co-operating workmen, but organic parents of the mental future which only require life-giving nourishment. We merely reverse the ignorance of the savages, who sowed gunpowder instead of making it, when we attempt to compound what can only be developed.

But although the spirit of education, always watching over the whole, is nothing more than an endeavour to liberate, by means of a free man, the ideal human being which lies concealed in every child; and though, in the application of the divine to the child's nature, it must scorn some useful things, some seasonable, individual, or immediate ends; yet it must incorporate itself in the most definite applications, in order to be clearly manifested.

Here the Author differs—but to his philosophical disadvantage—from those transcendental superintendents of the school-room slates, who write thereon with so round a piece of chalk that one may find in their broad strokes whatever one desires, and who lay down a complete Brownian system of education in the two words—strong, weak; though, indeed, Brown's disciple, Schmidt, only uttered one word—strong. Dr. Tamponet declared that he would trace heresies in the Lord's Prayer, if any one desired it; our age, on the contrary, knows how to find a Lord's Prayer in every heresy. A mother who has a particular child to educate can certainly extract no advantage from such philosophical indifferentism; although that class of fine, high-sounding compilations always bears witness to a certain amount of artistic talent in their sonorousness and their theft; hence, Gall justly found for this sense a place between the organs of music and stealing.

But this language does not belong to the Preface, and the object of this work has forbidden it to find a place in the book itself; wherefore, this may be regarded in form as my most serious production, to which only a short, occasional, comic Appendix shall be added.

The reader will please to take it patiently if he find what has been already printed again printed here. What has been printed is necessary as the bond and bast-matting of what has not been printed; but the bast-matting must not cover the whole garden instead of merely tying up the trees. But there are two still better excuses. Known rules in education gain new force if new experience verify them. The Author has three times been in the position of trying them upon different children of all ages and talents; and he now enjoys with his own the pedagogic ius trium liberorum (law of three children); and every other person's experience, related in this book, has been made his own. Secondly, printing ink now is like sympathetic ink, it becomes as quickly invisible as visible; wherefore it is good to repeat old thoughts in the newest books, because the old works in which they stand are not read. New translations of many truths, as of foreign standard works, must be given forth every half century. And, indeed, I wish that even old German standard books were turned into new German from time to time, and so could find their way into the circulating libraries.

Why are there flower and weed gleanings of every thing, but no wine or corn gleanings of the innumerable works on education? Why should one single good observation or rule be lost because it is imprisoned in some monstrous folio, or blown away in some single sheet? For dwarfs and giants, even in books, do not live long. Our age, this balloon, or air-ship, which, by simultaneous lighting of new lamps and throwing out of old ballast, has constantly mounted higher and higher, might now, I should think, cease to throw out and rather lovingly endeavour to collect than to disperse the old.

However little so disjointed a collection of thoughts could teach rules, it would yet arouse and sharpen the educational sense from which they originally sprung. Therefore every mother—still better every bride—ought to read the many-volumed and, in another sense, many-sided revision of education to which no nation can oppose any thing similar; she should read it, and cut and polish herself, like a precious stone, by it on every side, so that her individuality of character may all the more readily discover, protect, revere and cherish the dim manifestations of it in her child.

Something very different from such a progressive cabinet of noble thoughts, or even from my weak LEVANA, with her fragments in her arms, is the usual kind of complete system of education which one person after another has written, and will write. It is difficult—I mean the end, not the means. For it is very easy to proceed with bookbinder's and bookmaker's paste, and fasten together a thousand selected thoughts with five of your own, especially if you conscientiously remark in the preface that you have availed yourself of the labours of your predecessors, yet make no mention of one in the work itself, but sell such a miniature library in one volume to the reader as a mental facsimile of yourself. How much better in this case were a hole-maker than a hole-hider! How much better were it if associated authors (I mean those friendly hundreds who move along one path uttering precisely the same sound) entirely died out,—as Humboldt tells us that in the tropical regions there are none of those sociable plants which make our forests monotonous, but next each tree a perfectly different one grows. A diary about an ordinary child would be much better than a book upon children by an ordinary writer. Yes, every man's opinions about education would be valuable if he only wrote what he did not copy. The author, unlike a partner, should always only say "I," and no other word.

The first part of this work treats at large of the budding, the second and third of the blossoming, season of childhood. In the first, the three early years, like the academic triennium, after which the gate of the soul, language, is opened, are the object of care and observation. Here, educators are the Hours who open or close the gates of heaven. Here, true education, the developing, is yet possible; by whose means the long second, the curative, may be spared. For the child—yet in native innocence, before his parents have become his serpents on the tree—speechless, still unsusceptible of verbal empoisonment—led by customs, not by words and reasons, therefore all the more easily moved on the narrow and small pinnacle of sensuous experience:—for the child, I say, on this boundary line between the monkey and the man, the most important era of life is contained in the years which immediately follow his non-existence, in which, for the first time, he colours and moulds himself by companionship with others. The parent's hand may cover and shelter the germinating seed, but not the luxuriant tree; consequently, first faults are the greatest; and mental maladies, unlike the small-pox, are the more dangerous the earlier they are taken. Every new educator effects less than his predecessor; until at last, if we regard all life as an educational institution, a circumnavigator of the world is less influenced by all the nations he has seen than by his nurse.

At least this book has been composed with warmest love for the little beings, the delicate flower-gods of a soon fading Eden. May LEVANA, the motherly goddess who was formerly entreated to give a father's heart to fathers, hear the prayer which the title of this book addresses to her, and, in doing so, justify both it and this. The demands of the state or of learning, unfortunately, rob the child of half its father. The education of mos* fathers is but a system of rules to keep the child at a respectful distance from them, and to form him more with regard to their quiet than his powers; or at most, under a tornado of wrath, to impart as much meal of instruction as he can scatter. But I would ask men of business what education of souls rewards more delightfully and more immediately than that of the innocent, who resemble rosewood which imparts its odour ~~even~~ while being carved and shaped? Or what now remains to the decaying world—among so many ruins of what is noblest and ancientest—except children, the pure beings yet unfalsified by the age and the world? Only they, with a higher object than that for which they were formerly used, can behold futurity and truth in the magic mirror, and with bandaged eyes draw the precious lot from the wheel of chance. The words that the father speaks to his children in the privacy of home are not heard by the world; but, as in whispering galleries, they are clearly heard at the end and by posterity.

It would be my greatest reward if, at the end of twenty years, some reader as many years old should return thanks to me that the book which he is then reading was read by his parents.

JEAN PAUL FR. RICHTER.

BAIREUTH, May 2, 1806.

AUTHOR'S PREFACE TO SECOND EDITION.

THE second edition of a work on education is presented with love and respect to readers of both sexes: for the complete sale of the first is regarded as a proof that whilst the warlike Vesuvius and Etna were playing fire and thunder against each other, yet still the German fatherly and motherly heart was sufficiently endued with peacefulness, solicitude and love to attend to the mental requirements of the child-world, even in like manner as the parents take these children in their arms when saving them as best may be from flames and water.

May only LEVANA be right worthy of this participation in parental love!

This edition includes—besides small corrections, and besides the large local interpolations of certain contributions in education scattered throughout two journals, and also others not printed—many more exact conclusions to which I found myself urged by the opinion of one or another friendly critic, more especially those of Jena and Halle.

For perhaps no reproof is more to be considered than that of the well-disposed and like-minded: the approbation of enemies is nothing to it in point of weight, since it may just as often be a snare as a safeguard; and before a friendly critic, too, one wishes to defend neither the yes nor no of one's self, but only the matter itself.

To only one critical reviewer have I nothing to say, because he himself has said nothing: although this expression would do him too much honour, had he not interspersed his criticisms amongst the literary news of Göttingen, of which such as is scholarly continues to preserve its reputation for thoroughness, no less than that which is æsthetic and philosophical has continued to furnish the successive instalments of the "Nicolai-Library" * (which after long lullings has now sunk into slumber) so artfully that a limited intellect may already have had enough of these universal-German-library filibusters.

For the rest, the author of this gains in maturity less through other writers than through his own children. Life enlivens life, and children train us into ~~trainers~~ better than all trainers. Long before the first Levana, children (that is, experiences) were in fact his teachers, and books occasionally his "reminders." Yet experiences, since they can never be gained in sufficient number to amount to the strength of universal demonstration, can express anything only through a disposition of mind which imputes to them, from out of itself, and learns from them what is spiritual and universal. Hence educational writings, on account of the inexhaustible number of rules and the difficulty of choosing between them in each case, can only successfully and practically help by means of the stimulus and fostering of parental love and by a peculiar strength: all real strength, be it of the heart or head, can, if accompanied with love for children, educate with success even at the distance of ordinary methods.

The large number and sale of writings on education is explained from the circumstance that of all vocations that of education is most thickly beset with followers: amongst them all are both sexes at once, parents, yes, even those who have never been parents; so that consequently the instructor writes, not for one case, like one learned in theology, law or such-like, but for all cases of all people. But we Germans especially, partly from abundance of philanthropy, partly from want of money, partly from want of members mutually assisting, do spiritually for children by writing on paper that which the hospital for children in Paris, les enfants malades, and the "Club-of-Help" in Madrid try to do physically for the vagabond children of the streets—we wish to cure and teach their souls.

* Nicolai was a publisher and second-rate writer of Berlin. The "Library" was a periodical which continued to appear during a space of twenty-seven years.—Tr.

The author allows himself only to mention four important works on education which he has read since the publication of his own. The teaching of the general apart from the particular is, just as much as the teaching of the particular apart from the general, a departure from the correct instruction which comprises both: but this fruitful combination is found in SCHWARZ'S "Erziehungslehre" (Lessons in education) especially in the copious classification of the different species of dispositions (vol. iii. part i.). Of such flower-catalogues of child-souls we cannot have too many; they are, as it were, the little Linnæan labels on the seedlings of a tree and flower nursery. All our partitioned-cases for the characters of children are, however, as comprehensive and therefore as little classifying as a high book-case with only two shelves in it might be. The bud-indications of future genius, for example, we have scarcely at all, except only from themselves when they have already borne flowers and fruit; but the early watching of them by another would give a richer and purer return than their own after-recollection: it is a pity only that the teachers seldom know beforehand which child will be greater than themselves. It is true that through this ignorance on the part of the teachers the powers of the spirit of not even one genius will run wild, grow deformed, or become weakened—for such a one (for example Winckelmann) breaks like the moth from its chrysalis through the hard earth of all restraints without damage to the tender wings—but the powers of the heart, which often it little knows itself how to rule, can easily by unskilful hands be contorted into lasting errors. Thus it would be best that a father should always look upon his children as endowed with genius if at all possible (and this is easy, since he desires it only too much), and therefore keep, upon chance, a harvest register of their developing power.

Whilst Schwarz in his "Lessons," by a detailed treatment of the subject, and by a noble kindness of disposition appeals more to the mothers, NIETHAMMER in the "Streite des Philanthropismus und Humanismus" (Conflict of Philanthropism and Humanism), addresses himself more to the fathers; inasmuch as he recommends and prefers the formal education by means of languages as being the education of the whole correctly, rather than the material instruction through objects, as being piecemeal education; and would strengthen and steel the inner man more by intellectual labour than by intellectual feeding. With his pleasing enmity towards the present time—which by natural histories, Bertuchian picture-books, and other apparatus for the eye, transforms school-rooms into alps, where the plant is forced till it is meagre and small and its blossom over-large—I sympathized joyfully, as early as the first and second chapters of the seventh section, and I do so still. The educational power of philology becomes its own proof by means of his masterly logical demonstration. He is only wrong, as it seems, in excluding from the fellow-workers in the vineyard of formal education the deep-planting Pestalozzi, who, it may be, belongs even to its pioneers. As Pestalozzi's earliest harvests are invisible, that is to say, are only roots which cannot be disclosed to view, so his formal plan of education by means of mathematics differs from that of "Humanism" through philology only in respect to the tool employed. Both teachers are driven in their harvest-wagon towards the same point, but as they sit opposite to each other they look only at each other and at contrary roads.

GRASER in his work "Divinität der Menschenbildung" (Divineness of Human Education), sets out the four great means of advance towards Divinity (like the four gospels), Justice, Love, Truth, and Art or Beauty, as the four educational elements. Certainly, instead of the word "Divinität" (divineness), as unusual as it is supermundane, he might with more conformity to language and life have said "Gottähnlichkeit" (likeness to God), seeing that the best education, as a second after-creation of the God-like image in man, can only leave us all as vapoury cold mock-suns to the primeval Sun of the world, standing no higher than the clouds of earth. In truth, the educational principle of Divineness existed already in the earlier one of Humanity, since only as God-Man do we find and know divinity in mankind; but the radiance of the Ideal dwelling in pure eternity throws us the light upon our path more clearly than the human-reality dimmed by time. For the rest, the author, who has not so much woven-in as woven-on the definite to the most general, surprises us pleasantly at the conclusion with definite embodyings, in fact, with hints so practical that one would willingly have given them a good deal more space and room for play, ~~by~~ clearing away earlier sheets of transcendentalism. But can he not take some ordinary white sheets, and give us upon them as long a continuation of his Education-praxis as we have already desired to have in our hands?

In the "Allgemeine Pädagogik" (Universal-Pedagogic) of Herbart the beautiful language beguiling with brilliancy and charms cannot, however, divert the wish that he had not used the title-privilege "universal" so universally, and carried it throughout, so that the reader is obliged to fill in the too spacious forms with supplementary contents. In a philosopher, if he be a teacher, one finds often enough, to be sure, only the polar star which, it is true, serves well for a long voyage round the world, but not for a short one in the world: even as philosophers in general resemble the Jewish prophets (or even weather-prophets), who predict more easily of a century than their own approaching death-day, just as in history (if I may allow myself a too ponderous comparison) even Providence unveils itself not in years, but in centuries—and scarcely in them, since the revealing century becomes again the veil of the next. But when Herbart wishes to strengthen and to stretch the muscle-strings and bowstrings of the character, then he enters powerfully into the special and definite, and with good reason, since the drift of his words and thoughts bear witness that he possesses one himself. Certainly for education, the character is the true elemental-fire: if only the instructor has it, it will, if not enkindle at any rate give warmth and bring out abilities. The present century—a volcanic isle that glows, works, trembles, and heaves—should at length have learnt and discovered from the political colossus who is now standing on the borders of two centuries, through the victories over his sea-fishers toiling hither and thither, the contents and worth of a character: for a character is a rock on which stranded sailors land, and the headstrong are wrecked. No happy future for a nation was ever yet to be built up but by hands of which the first and second fingers could, intellectually, clench themselves into fists. So says hoary History to this very day, but she speaks as a chattering woman and sibyl more and more year by year, and knows not how to stop.

This most recent, computed wealth of educational ~~works~~, even with the omission of many other sources of profit, elevates the German, amongst European nations, to the position of the teaching one; and German schools, like several towns in France, ought to bear the honourable title of "the good." Even as Lessing called the insignificant-seeming Jews the educators of the human race, so in the Germans perhaps we may be promised the educators of the future. Love and strength, or inner harmony and courage, are the poles of education: so Achilles learnt from the centaur to play the lyre and at the same time to draw the bow.

Yet let us above all consider, before we invert the delusion of sailors—who often take ice-fields for land—and take the land of the future for an ice-field, that to all nations of the earth, even the more servile (to say nothing of those more free), the nursery of education has remained as a sunny spot and a refuge for freedom undestroyed by time and circumstance.

Amongst all secret societies and clubs which the State in critical times often prohibits, the family-clubs of as many children as one has had baptized are yet endured without hesitation. Let us then, with the short child-arm—that is to say with the long arm of the lever—build and move the future, and unweariedly and bravely help to work out the good of the present, and to bury in the bad. Yes, even he, whose children's fruit-harvest may tarry too long, let him say to himself, "my grandchildren too are human beings," and let him continue to sow.

JEAN PAUL FR. RICHTER.

BAIRFUTH, 21st November, 1811.

LEVANA;
OR,
THE DOCTRINE OF EDUCATION.

FIRST FRAGMENT.

CHAP. I. Importance of Education, § 1—3. CHAP. II. Discourse against its Influence, § 4—15. CHAP. III. Discourse for the same, § 16—20.

CHAPTER I

IMPORTANCE OF EDUCATION.

§ 1.

WHEN Antipater demanded fifty children as hostages from the Spartans, they offered him, in their stead, a hundred men of distinction; unlike ordinary educators, who precisely reverse the offering. The Spartans thought rightly and nobly. In the world of childhood all posterity stands before us, upon which we, like Moses upon the promised land, may only gaze, but not enter; and at the same time it renews for us the ages of the young world behind which we must appear; for the child of the most civilised capital is a born Otaheitan, and the one-year-old Sansculotte a first Christian, and the last children of the earth came upon the world with the paradise of our first parents. So, according to Bruyn, the children of the Samojeds are beautiful and only the parents ugly. If there were a perfect and all-powerful system of education, and a unity of educators with themselves and with one another; then, since each generation of children begins the history of the world anew, the immediate, and through it the distant future, in which we can now gaze and grasp so little, would stand much more fairly in our power. For deeds and books—the means by which we have hitherto been able to work upon the world—always find it already defined and hardened and full of people like ourselves; only by education can we sow upon a pure, soft soil the seeds of poison or of honey-bearing flowers; and as the gods to the first men, so do we, physical and spiritual giants to children, descend to these little ones, and form them to be great or small. It is a touching and a mighty thought that now before their educator, the great spirits and teachers of our immediate posterity creep, as the sucklings of his milk-store—that he guides future suns, like little wandering stars, in his leading-strings. And it is all the more important because he can neither know whether he has before him, to unfold to good or evil, a hell-god for humanity, or a protecting and light-giving angel; nor can foresee at what dangerous moment of futurity the magician, who, transformed into a little child, now plays before him, will rise up a giant.

§ 2.

Our immediate future demands thought: our earth is filled with gunpowder—like the age of the migration of nations, ours prepares itself for spiritual and political wanderings, and under all state buildings, professorial chairs and temples the earth quakes. Do you know whether the little boy who plucks flowers at your side may not one day, from his island Corsica, descend as a war-god into a stormy universe, to play with storms and to destroy, or to purify and to sow? Would it then be indifferent whether, in educating him, you had been his Fénélon, his Cornelia, or his Dubois? For although you might not be able to break or bend the power of genius—the deeper the sea, the more precipitous the coast;—yet in the most important initiatory decade of life, in the first, at the opening dawn of all feelings, you might surround and overlay the slumbering lion energies with all the tender habits of a gentle heart and all the bands of love. Whether an angel or a devil educate that great genius is of far more importance than whether a learned doctor or a Charles the Simple teach him.

Although a system of education must, in the first instance, provide for the beings endowed with genius—since these, though they seldom arise, yet alone rule the world's history, either as leaders of souls, or of bodies, or of both—yet would such a system too much resemble a practical exposition of how to conduct one's self in case of winning the great prize, if it did not observe that the multitude of mediocre talents on which a great one can act are quite as important in the mass as the man of genius is in the individual. And therefore, since, on the one hand, you give to posterity, as alms to a beggar, through children; and, on the other, must send these last, like unarmed men, into a hidden period whose poisonous gales you know not: so there is nothing more important to posterity than whether you send forth your pupil as the seed-corn of a harvest, or the powder-train of a mine which destroys itself and everything with it: and nothing is more important to the child than whether you have or have not given him a magic jewel which may preserve and conduct him uninjured.

Let a child be more holy to you than the present which consists of things and matured men. By means of the child—although with difficulty—by means of the short lever arm of humanity, you set in motion the long one, whose mighty arc you can scarcely define in the height and depth of time. But there is something else you certainly know; namely, that the moral development—which is education, as the intellectual is instruction—knows and fears no time nor futurity. In this you give to the child a heaven with a pole-star, which may ever guide him in whatever new countries he may afterwards reach.

§ 3.

A perfect child would be a heavenly Aurora of the soul; at least its appearance would not be so variously restrained and so difficult as that of a perfect man.

On him everything, from the state down to himself, exercises a forming influence; but on the fresh child, parents repeat with full power the lawgiving, moulding character of Lycurgus and of Moses; they can separate their pupil from others, and form him without interference, better than a Spartan or Jewish state could do. Consequently one ought to expect more from the unlimited monarchy of parents. Children living in this kingdom, without Salic law, and in such an overflow of laws and lawgivers that the rulers are often more numerous than the ruled, and the governing house larger than the governed—having everywhere before them cabinet orders, and offended majesties, and most rapid mandata sine clausula, and behind the glass the exalted sceptre of the rod—possessing in their sovereign their bread-master, as well as their pain and pleasure master—and protected against him by no foreign power; for mal-treatment of slaves is punished in many countries, even of cattle in England, but nowhere of children,—children, then, thus absolutely governed without opposition party, or anti-ministerial gazette, and without representatives, should issue, one would think, out of this smallest state within the state, far better educated than grown-up persons educated in the greatest of all educational establishments, the state itself.

Nevertheless, both educational establishments and states seem to work so uniformly, that it is worth while, next to the necessity of education, to consider, in the two following discourses, its possibility.

CHAPTER II.

INAUGURAL DISCOURSE AT THE JOHANNEUM-PAULLINUM; OR, PROOF THAT EDUCATION EFFECTS LITTLE.

§ 4.

Most honoured Inspector of schools, Rector, Con- and Sub-rector, master of the third class! most worthy teacher of the lower classes and fellow-labourers! I hope I shall,

to the best of my abilities, express my pleasure at being inducted, as lowest teacher into your educational establishment by entering on my post of honour with the proof that school education, as well as home education, has neither evil consequences, nor any other. If I am so fortunate as to lead us all to a quiet conviction of this absence of consequences, I may also possibly obtain that we shall all fill our laborious offices easily and cheerfully, without boasting, and with a certain confidence that needs fear nothing; every day we shall walk in and out among the pupils, sit on our teaching-chair as on an easy chair, and let every thing take its own course.

First, I believe, I must set forth who are the educators and complete fashioners of children,—for fashioned, in one way or another, they are; and in which way rests with and in us;—and afterwards I will naturally touch upon ourselves, and point out the easy change which may be effected.

§ 5.

Whence comes it that hitherto no age has spoken, counselled and done so much about education as our own; and again, among nations, none so much as Germany, into which Rousseau's winged seeds have been blown out of France and ploughed in? The ancients wrote and did little for it; their schools were rather for young men than children, and in the philosophical schools of Athens the learner frequently was, or might be, older than the teacher. Sparta was a Stoa, or garrison-school, at once for parents and children. The Romans had Grecian slaves for their schoolmasters, and yet their children became neither Greeks nor slaves. In the ages when the great and glorious deeds of Christendom and knighthood and freedom rose like stars on the dark horizon of Europe, school buildings lay scattered around as mere dull, little, dark, savage huts, or monks' cells. And what have the political vowels of Europe—the English—whose island is a school of citizens, and whose election every seven years is a wandering seven-day Sunday school? what have they hitherto better than mere establishments for mal-education? Where do the children more resemble the parents—and to any thing else than a mirror of himself, be it a flat, a concave, or a convex one, the teacher cannot wish to mould and polish his pupil—than even in those places where the educators are silent, among savages, Greenlanders and Quakers?

And the further one looks back through past ages to the hoary nations of antiquity, the fewer school books and Cyropedias—in fact, from want of all books—were there: all the more was the man lost in the state; all the less was the woman, who might have educated, formed for it: nevertheless, every child was the image of its parents, which is more than the best ought to desire, since God can only behold his own image in men as a caricature. And are not our present improved educational institutions a proof that men can raise themselves freely and without aid from bad to better, and, consequently, to all other establishments of a similar kind?

§ 6.

But who then educates in nations and ages?—Both!—The living time, which for twenty or thirty years struggles unceasingly with men through actions and opinions, tossing them to and fro as with a sea of waves, must soon wash away or cover the precipitate of the short school years, in which only one man, and only words taught. The century is the spiritual climate of man, mere education the hothouse and forcing pit, out of which he is taken and planted for ever in the other. By century is here meant the real century, which may as often truly consist of ten years as of ten thousand, and which is dated, like religious eras, only from great men.

What can insulated words do against living present action? The present has for new deeds also new words; the teacher has only dead languages for the, to all appearance, dead bodies of his examples.

The educator has himself been educated and is already possessed, even without his knowledge, by the spirit of the age, which he assiduously labours to banish out of the youth (as a whole city criticises the spirit of the whole city). Only, alas! every one believes himself to stand so precisely and accurately in the zenith of the universe, that, according to his calculation, all suns and nations must culminate over his head; and he himself, like the countries at the equator, cast no shadow save into himself alone. For were this not so, how could so many—as I also hereafter propose to do—speak of the spirit of the age, when every word implies a rescue from, and elevation above it; just as we cannot perceive the ebb and flow of the tide in the ocean, but only at its boundaries, the coasts. In like manner a savage cannot depict a savage so clearly as a civilized man can do. But in truth, the painters of the spirit of the age have for the most part represented the last one, nothing more. The great man, the poet and thinker, has never been so clearly known to himself that the crystal light-holder and the light have become one; much less then have other men. However easily blooming every man may open towards the sky, he is yet drawn down by a root into the dark, firm earth.

§ 7.

The spirit of the nation and of the age decides and is at once the schoolmaster and the school; for it seizes on the pupil to form him with two vigorous hands and powers; with the living lesson of action, and with its unalterable unity. If—to begin with unity—education must be, like the Testament, a continuous endeavour to withdraw the force of interrupting mixtures, then nothing builds up so strong as the present, which ceases not for a moment and eternally repeats itself; and which, with joy and sorrow, with towns and books, with friends and enemies—in short, with thousand-handed life, presses and seizes on us. No teacher of the people continues so uniformly one with himself as the teaching people. Minds, molten into masses, lose something of free movement, which bodies, for instance that of the world, perhaps that of the universe, seem to gain by their very massiveness, and as heavy colossi move only the more easily along the old, iron-covered track. For however much marriages, old age, deaths and enmities, are in the individual case subject to the law of freedom; yet lists of births and deaths can be made for a "whole nation, and it may be shown that in the Canton of Berne (according to Mad. de Staël) the number of divorces, as in Italy that of murders, is the same from year to year. Must not, now, the little human being placed on such an eternally and ever similarly acting world be borne as upon a flying earth, where the only directions that a teacher can give avail nothing, because he has first unconsciously received his line of movement upon it? Thence, in spite of all reformers and informers, nations, like meadows, reach ever a similar verdure; thence, even in capital cities, where all schoolbooks and schoolmasters, and even parents of every kind educate, the spirit maintains itself unalterably the same.

Repetition is the mother not only of study but also of education. Like the fresco painter, the teacher lays colours on the wet plaster which ever fade away, and which he must ever renew until they remain and brightly shine. Who then, at Naples for instance, lays the colours most frequently on the spiritual tablet of one individual, the one tutor, or the multitude of 30,000 advocates, 30,000 lazzaroni, and 30,000 monks; a threefold company of fates, or ninefold one of nine murderers, compared with which Vesuvius is a quiet man who suffers himself to be entreated by Saint Januarius * (although not in January)?

Certainly one might say that also in families there educates, besides the popular masses, a pedagogic crowd of people; at least, for instance, aunts, grandfathers, grandmothers, father, mother, godparents, friends of the family, the yearly domestics, and at the end of all, the instructor beckons with his fore-finger, so that—could this force continue as long as it would gladly be maintained—a child, under these many masters, would resemble, much more than one thinks, an Indian slave who wanders about with the inburnt stamps of his various masters. But how does the multitude disappear compared with the higher one by which it was coloured; just as all the burnt marks of the slave yet cannot overcome the hot black colouring of the sun, but receive it as a coat of arms in a sable field!

* The protecting saint of the Neapolitans against Vesuvius.

§ 8.

The second mighty power by which the spirit of the age and people teaches and conquers is the living action. Not the cry, says a Chinese author, but the rising of a wild duck impels the flock to follow him in upward flight. One war fought against a Xerxes inflames the heart quite differently, more purely and more strongly than the perusal of it three times in Cornelius, Plutarch, and Herodotus: for this last, along with the whole teaching of school phrases, is merely an intellectual imitation in cork (a phelloplastic, according to Böttiger's retranslation into the Greek) in order easily to represent ancient temples and magnificent buildings in light cork forms. Yea, the mere ancestral images of deeds in Plutarch's Westminster Abbey cast the seeds of the divine word more deeply into the heart than one or a few thousand volumes of sermons full of true pulpit eloquence. Heaven! if words could be compressed to deeds, only a thousand to one, could they yet arouse upon an earth in which pulpits, professors' chairs and libraries of all ages snow down unceasingly their most pure cold exhortations, one single passion to hurl forth volcanic fire? Would not history then be surrounded with mere snow craters and icebergs? Ah! most respected teachers, if even we, with our great college libraries that preach to us for tens of years, have never once been brought so far as to become holy men for a month, nay for a week, what dare we expect from the few volumes of words which we let fall in school hours? Or what more should the parents at home expect?

The pedagogic powerlessness of words is unfortunately confessed in a peculiar manner, which is daily renewed in each of us. Namely, every individual being is divided into a teacher and his scholars; or is split up into the teacher's chair and the scholars' bench. Should you now believe that this perpetual house-tutor in the four chambers of the brain—who daily gives private lessons to the sharer of his apartment, philanthropist and boarder—who is a morning, evening and night preacher—who never ceases with his conversatorium and repetitorium—who accompanies the pupil, whom he loves as himself and conversely, everywhere with notes of instruction as tutor on his travels, in idle hours and wine-drinkings, by seats on the throne, by the chair of instruction and elsewhere—who, as the most unlimited head-master to be found under the skull, ever sleeps with his scholar, as a serjeant with a recruit, in the same bed, and from time to time reminds him of much when a man has forgotten himself, in short, could you believe that this so extremely rare Mentor, who from the pineal-gland, as the lodging place of the high light, eternally teaches downward, nevertheless after fifty and more judgments and years, has experienced nothing better in his Telemachus, than what the pure Minerva (the well-known and anonymous Mentor in the Telemachus) with all her modesty, in the greatest head of the world, in that of Jupiter, also had to experience, namely, that she could not spare her pupil a single one of his animal transformations? This, indeed, were scarcely to be believed if we did not daily see the most lamentable instances of it in ourselves. There is, for example, in the history of the learned something very usual and very pitiful: that excellent men have resolved for many years to rise earlier in a morning, without much coming of it—unless they may perhaps break through the habit at the last day.

§ 9.

Permit us to return: and since we have easily asked whether a man may be more effectually moved by a thousand outward foreign words than by a billion of his own inward ones, let us not be very much astonished if the stream of words which is given to the youth, in order that he may thereby guide and bear himself up in the ocean, should be dissipated by the winds and waves on every side. But give us leave to remark that we lay many things to the account of school-rooms, that is, of words, which have in fact had their sole origin on the common teaching-ground of action; just as, in former times, general pestilences were ascribed to the poisoning of particular wells by the Jews. The schoolhouse of the young soul does not merely consist of lecture and lesson rooms, but also of the school ground, the sleeping room, the eating room, the play-ground, the staircase, and of every place. Heaven! what intermixture of other influences, always either to the advantage or prejudice of education! The physical growth of the pupil nourishes and draws forth a mental one! Nevertheless, this is ascribed to the pedagogic tan-bed; just as if one must not necessarily grow cleverer and taller at the same time! One might quite as properly attribute the service of the muscles to the leading-strings. Parents very often in their own children regard that as the effect of educational care and attention which in strangers they would merely consider the consequence of human growth. There are so many illusions! If a great man have gone through any one educational establishment, he is ever after explained by that: either he did not resemble it, and then it is held to have been a moulding counter-irritation; or he did, and then it acted as an incitement to life. In the same way one might regard the blue library, whose binding taught the librarian Duval his first lessons in arithmetic, as an arithmetical book and school for arithmetic. If parents, or men in general, in all their education seek nothing else than to make their physical image into their more perfect mental one, and consequently to varnish over this copy with the departed brightness of the original, then must they readily fall into the mistake of esteeming an inborn resemblance an acquired one, and physical fathers spiritual ones, and nature freedom. But in this and the former consideration, that holds true of children which does of nations: there were found in the new world ten customs of the old—six Chinese in Peru, four Hottentotish in western America*,—without any other nearer descent to account for these resemblances than the general one from Adam, or humanity.

§ 10.

We may, excellent fellow-workers, especially flatter ourselves with services to humanity when the position is proved true, that we effect little, or nothing, by education.

* Zimmermann's History of Man, vol. iii.

As in the mechanical world every motion, if the opposition of friction were removed, would be unceasingly continued, and every change become eternal; so, in the spiritual world, if the pupil less bravely opposed and vanquished the teacher, a more beggarly life would be eternally repeated than we can at all picture to ourselves. I mean this: if all the ways and times of this poor earth were to be filled with dull stiff images from pedagogic old principality-law-codes and Swabia-law-codes, that is with counterfeits of school-men, so that consequently every age would be reprinted from the preceding one, manikin for manikin; * what else is wanted for this tedious misery but that education should succeed beyond our expectations, and a tutor and schoolmaster allow his head, like a crowned one, to pass stamped in all hands and corners? And a whole bench of knights might become an assembly of candidates fit for the tournament, because they had been previously clean and well copied after the quiet burgher's pattern?

But we will venture to hope the opposite; the schoolmaster and tutor is ever afterwards connected with the nobleman as God with nature; concerning which Seneca justly writes—semel jussit, semper paret—i.e., the tutor's study is very soon closed, and the ante-chamber and audience-hall opened.

In order not to fall into the error of those who introduce the bird Phoenix and the Man in the Moon unwived, I have here in my thoughts girls also, on whom, as on pigeons and canary birds, false colours are painted by governesses, as well as by tutors, which the first rain or moulting removes. But, as has been said, every woman becomes in time something peculiar; a beautiful Idioticon of her many provinces of language.

§ 11.

Through long teaching, to which no advance of the pupil is sufficiently proportioned, schoolmasters of understanding may arrive at the question: "How will the poor scholar be able to walk in the right path without our leading-strings, since even with them he runs into error?"—and also at this wish: "Good heavens! that we could but wind him up and fix him, exactly like an astronomical hundred-yearred chronometer, so that he might show the hours and positions of the planets and every thing quite accurately long after our death!"—and consequently at this opinion: "That they were in fact the soul of his inner man, and had to raise his every limb, or were at least his supporting mould, in which he ought not merely to carry his broken arm, as in a gentle bandage, but also his leg, his head and his entrails, so as to be completely strengthened." If the tutor accompany his young master to the university, the one goes into much good society without the other: and if they both at last set off on their travels, the young gentleman goes into much of a suspicious nature, and the tutor ends his anxiety;—which resembles the anxiety of a mother as to how the poor naked foetus can exist when it comes into this cold blowing world and is no longer nourished by her blood.

* An expression used of a second edition when it is a reprint of the first; which (as this minor proposition demonstrates) is not the case here.

Truly your singing bird of a pupil will continue to whistle for you through the night; because, by a night-light, that is by an education out of season, you delude him into the belief of an artificial day-light; but, when he once flies into the open air, he will then only arrange his notes and sound them at the general break of day.

If we place ourselves on another eminence to contemplate thence the directions, fears and demands of teachers, we almost feel tempted to drive them down from their lofty position, especially because they, the educators, assume and presume so much; for they do not take and set before them the great World-plan as their school-plan, nor the All-educator as an example to the poor hedge-schoolmaster man,—but do so anxiously endeavour, with their narrow views, to assist the infinite Pedagogiarich (Prince of teachers) who permits sun to revolve round sun, and child round father, and so the child's and father's father are alike,—as if humanity, neglected for thousands of years, were laid before them, like warm wax, on which they had to impress their own individual induration, to produce future indurations; so that they might as recreators agreeably surprise the Creator with a living seal and plaster cabinet of their coats of arms and heads.

A long period, and here again a long period !

§ 12.

None of all my hearers, of whom I am the nearest, can have forgotten that at the commencement I asked why so much at present in Germany is written about education and grounded upon it, as I also myself intend to lay some printed ideas on the subject before the public. I answer, for this reason ; because by cultivation all humanity has become a speaking machine, and the flesh a word. The more education the more notions ; the less action the more speech ; man is becoming a man by profession, as there were formerly Christians by profession ; and the ear his sensorium commune. The beggar, for instance, passes by the great citizen unnoticed ; the one has fled from the other, not merely in deed, but beyond that, in word : just as battles, pestilences and such like, pass over us only as gentle sounds. Therefore is poetry so beneficial as a counterbalance to civilisation, because it draws an artistic life round the thin shadows, and erects on the battle-field of mere sensuous views its own glorious visions. But as the German spends no time so willingly as a time for consideration—to the most important step he made, namely that into life, he took an eternity of consideration—he prefers steady, slow writing, to quick hither and thither roving speech ; unlike the Southerners, he is less a speech-loving than a writing-loving people, as his registries and book-shelves prove. “A word, a man,”* means now “black on white, a man.” Writing and fact, or clothing and body, are now as distinct from one another as shoe and foot, which, as a measure, mean with us the same thing. It all depends on one little stroke whether Christ is God or not ; namely, on the well-known passage, 1 Tim. iii. 16, in the Alexandrine codex, where a little stroke with the back of the pen changes OC [i.e. Oς] into

* A common proverbial expression, signifying that no written contract is necessary when a man has given his word.—Tr.

©C (©εος), and upon an "Or" in the Carolina,* whether a man should be hanged or not.

But now if the inner being of the cultivated man is merely composed, like some drawings, of letters and words, then enough can never be said of and in education, since the consciousness of having separated the inner life into ideas, consequently into words, secures the certainty of being able again to re-construct it by means of the separated component parts, that is, by means of words; in short, to educate through the means of speech, by the pen and the tongue. "Draw," said Donatello to the sculptors, "and you will be able to do the rest." "Speak," say we to teachers, "and you will show how to act."

As every kind of existence only propagates itself by itself; for example, deeds only by deeds, words by words, education by education; we will, excellent fellow-labourers, cheer and strengthen ourselves in the hope that our teaching may spiritually reward us by the elevation of our pupils into teachers, who may hereafter speak more extendedly with others; and that our Johanneum-Paullinum may serve as an educational institution for many educational institutions, while we send forth from our school-gates matured house-tutors, school-keepers and catechizers, to produce their equals in good school-houses,—not Cyruses, but Cyropedias and Cyropedagogiarchs.

§ 13.

I now turn to the most worshipful fathers of the city, our supporters and school-archs, not only with thanks, but also with entreaties. There remains, namely, in the most unpractical men and speakers a something harsh and real—it is called, harshly enough, Stomach—which, from selfishness, values in the tongue only its imports, not its exports. Enough; every one possesses this member; and it is this especially that makes us wish our school might be raised into a finance or industrial school for all those who receive their incomes from it, so that every one who as scholar subscribes to it may gladly again enter it in order to be paid as teacher. Moreover our school book-shop, less truly school-library, and our school-purse, yea and our school widow's fund, might be well supported; and so of every thing else, for the only school sickness which teachers have is hunger, an evil for which the state should supply domestic means, or so called housekeeper's provision.

* Art. 159.

But since all of us, especially as educators of youth, wish to live for something fairer and more enduring than our dinner of black soup, for which we must first all day long distribute whipping-soup, I venture, unabashed, to prefer the proud request: That the desk from which the third master and music teacher, as well as myself, have to propound the needful instruction, may be newly coloured, merely like a book or a Prussian post house, black and white; and that the Lyceum may receive, if not the name Gymnasium, yet the epithet Royal, and that we may all, as far as possible, be addressed by the title of Professors. Perhaps the school friendship, which has hitherto confined itself to the scholars, might then be extended to the teachers. Fiat!—Dixi!

§ 14.

Scarcely had the author composed and delivered this inaugural discourse, than so much of a resignation speech was found in it, that a fair opportunity to deliver this also, and to explain himself more at large, was afforded by his removal which occurred a few days afterwards. Thereby he was placed in a position to take leave of his fellow-teachers as publicly as he had received his dismissal, and at the same time to choose as text for his short farewell discourse—The Educational Chair (which he mounted for the second and last time), and to impress upon them its importance.

. . .

CHAPTER III.

IMPORTANCE OF EDUCATION.

§ 15.

MOST honoured brothers in office! In laying down my short-held office with a certain consoling consciousness that none of those intrusted to my charge will ever stand forth to reproach me with an erroneous plan of teaching, or with hours of instruction gossiped away, I can find no theme for a farewell more connected with the subject than the consideration how deeply a good education penetrates into the heart of the age; and I choose this the more readily, because it will give me an opportunity to place in a new light much that the day before yesterday was laid down by my predecessor in this desk, the deliverer of the inaugural discourse,—for here I do not venture to speak of myself in any other way since my dismissal.

It shall only be proved that he advanced mere sophisms, which originally, according to Leibnitz, signified only exercises in wisdom.

“For what other reason,” he asks, “do men now write so much about education, than because,” he answers, “our whole existence has passed into words, and words so easily, by means of tongues and ears, into the soul.” But is this, pray, anything different from what I myself maintain? We shall see.

§ 16.

No former age or people is to be compared with any since the invention of printing; for since that time there have been no more isolated states, and consequently no isolated influence of the state on its component parts. Strangers and returned travellers, whom Lycurgus excluded from his republic, like episodes and the intervention of gods from the dramatic unities, now traverse every country in the shape of cheap books and waste paper. No one is any longer alone, not even an island in the most distant sea; thence comes it that the political balance of power of many states collected under one arm of the balance is now first mooted. Europe is an interlaced, mis-grown, banyan-forest round which the other quarters of the world creep, like parasitic plants, and nourish themselves on its decayed parts. Books form a universal republic, a union of nations, or a society of Jesus, in a nobler sense, or a Humane society, whereby a second or duplicate Europe arises; which, like London, lies in several counties and districts. As now, on the one side, the book-pollen flying everywhere brings the disadvantage that no people can any longer produce a bed of flowers true and unspotted with foreign colours:—as now no state can be any longer formed purely, slowly, and by degrees from itself, but, like an Indian idol composed of different animals, must see the various members of the neighbouring states mingled with its growth;—so, on the other side, through the Œcumenic Council of the book-world, the spirit of a provincial assembly can no longer slavishly enchain its people, and an invisible church frees it from the visible one.—And therefore we educate now with some hope for the age because we know that the spoken word of the German teacher is re-echoed by the printed page; and that the citizen of the world, under the supervision of the universal republic, will not sink into the citizen of an injurious state, all the more because, though books may be dead yet glorified men, their pupils will ever hold themselves as their living relatives.

That the age writes so much on education shows at once its absence and the feeling of its importance. Only lost things are cried about the streets. The German state itself no longer educates sufficiently; consequently the teacher should do it in the nursery, from the pulpit, and from the desk. The forcing-houses in Rome and Sparta are destroyed,—in Sinai and in the Arabian desert some few yet stand. The old circle, that the state should plan and direct the education, and this again act on that, has been very much rectified, or indeed squared, by the art of printing; for now men, elevated above all states, educate states; dead men, for instance, like Plato; just as in the deep old morning-world, according to the Saga, angels with glories wandered about, guided, like children, the new men who had sprung out of the ruins, and, having ended their instruction, vanished into heaven. The earth, according to Zach's ingenious idea, has been formed from congregated moons; one moon, striking on the American side, drove the deluge over the old world; the sharp-pointed, wildly-up-piled Switzerland is nothing more than a visible moon that once tumbled from its pure ether down to the earth,—and so there is in intellectual Europe, far more than in any age or quarter of the world not addicted to printing, a congregation of soul-worlds, or of world-souls, sent or fallen from heaven. The great man has now a higher throne, and his crown shines over a wider plain; for he works not only by action, but also by writing,—not only by his word, but also, like thunder, by its echo. So one mind influences its neighbouring minds, and through them the masses. As many little ships draw a large one into harbour, so inferior minds bring the great one to shore that it may be unladen.

§ 17.

My predecessor, however, might grant or add much; namely, that if the great body of authors have gradually assumed the educational position once held by quacks and fortunetellers, the great advancing mass of the people, which so easily overpowers in its vast ocean the early teaching of childhood, has itself changed and increased. "Libraries, and two yearly book-fairs—not including the one of reprints at Frankfort—surpass, I should think, a few schoolbooks and their expounders," the deliverer of the address might, and probably does, say. But a principal point here must not be overlooked.

It is indubitable that everything impresses man either formingly or improvingly; so that, I think, not merely an assembly of people and of books, and great electric effusions in his heaven's equator discompose him, but also that damp weather unnerves him,—hence it is certain that no man can take a walk without bringing home an influence on his eternity; every spur, every star of heaven and of knighthood, every beetle, every trip or touch of the hand as certainly engraves itself upon us, as the gentle dewdrop or the hanging of a mist affects the granite mountains. But just as certainly, on the other hand, is this assertion necessary: "That the strength of every impression depends on our condition yesterday, to-day, and to-morrow." For the human being assimilates more spiritual food the less he has hitherto received; as he never grows more rapidly and disproportionately to the given nourishment than as foetus: but, after he has reached the point of satiety, he rejects so much that it is well the brief youth of the individual is compensated by the eternal youth of humanity, whose point of satiety is marked on a scale which takes centuries and nations for the fractions of its lines.

On this account education is always counselled to do as much as possible during the first year of life; for it can then effect more with half the power than it can in the eighth with double, when the sense of freedom is aroused, and all the conditions of being indefinitely multiplied. As farmers believe it most advantageous to sow in mist, so the first seeds of education should fall in the first and thickest mist of life.

In the first place have regard to morality. The inner man is, like the negro, born white and only coloured black by life. If in mature years great examples of moral worth pass by without influencing our course of life more than a flying comet does that of the earth, yet in the deep heart of childhood the first inner or outer object of love, injustice, &c., throws a shadow or a light immeasurably far along its years; and as, according to the elder theologians, we only inherited Adam's first sin, not his other sins, since in one fall we copied every fall; so the first fall and the first flight influence us our whole life long. For in this early moment the Eternal works the second miracle; the gift of life was the first. It is then that the God-man is conceived and born of human nature; that self-consciousness, whereby a responsible being first appears, may be boldly called a conscience and a God—and unblessed is the hour in which this growing human being finds no immaculate conception, but in the moment of birth the Saviour and his Judas meet. Too little attention has been paid to this one invaluable moment, its environments and its fruits. There are men who can remember far back to this bounding hour of existence, in which their self-consciousness suddenly burst through the clouds like a sun, and wonderfully revealed a beaming universe. Life, especially moral life, has a flight, then a leap, then a step, then a halt; each year renders a man less easy to convert, and a missionary can effect less on a wicked sexagenarian than an auto-da-fé.

§ 18.

What is true of the heart of the inner man is true also of his eye. If the former, like an ancient Christian church, must be turned towards the morning of childhood; the latter, like a Grecian temple, receives its greatest light from the entrance and from above. For, in regard to intellectual education, the child walks hand in hand with a nature which never returns; this nature is hitherto a wintry desert full of spring buds: wherever a sunbeam strikes it (for all teaching is warming into life rather than sowing) there the green leaves burst forth, and the whole child's life consists of warm creation days.

Two forces are at work: first, childlike trust, that imbibing power without which there could be no education and no language, but the child would resemble a bird taken too late from the nest, which must starve because it will not open its beak to the hand which brings its food. But this trust shows itself only in the minority, and sleeps in the mass of men and years. The second power is excitability. As in the physical, so in the spiritual child, it exists in the highest degree in the physical and spiritual morning of life, and decreases with age, until at last nothing in the empty world excites the worn-out man except the future. Then the whole universe may strive to press its marks upon the man, but on the hardened matter only weak impressions remain. The spirit of his age and nation must work unceasingly on the child: at first his only teachers are the age and nation. Moravians, Quakers, and especially Jews, give a direction to education which predominates over the surrounding dissimilar ages and people: and although even they are influenced by the spirit of the age and of the multitude, yet it impresses them much more slightly than the masses who are differently educated. And however the spirit of the age may move and turn the heart, that little world, yet, like all balls revolving on themselves, it retains two innate, immoveable poles—the good and the bad.

§ 19.

Moreover, the whole mass of people does not, as my predecessor seems to assert, rush on the individual human being. Only some few in later as in early life affect the formation of our characters; the multitude passes by like a distant army. One friend, one teacher, one beloved, one club, one dining table, one work table, one house are, in our age, the nation and national spirit influencing the individual, while the rest of the crowd passes him without leaving a trace behind. But when do individuals affect us so powerfully as in childhood? or when so long—for in education, as in law*, long means ten years—as in the first decade? The waves of the ocean, besides, before reaching the child, break against four walls which encompass the water of his education or crystallisation: father, mother, brothers and sisters, and a few extra people are his forming world and mould. But, all this deducted, we must remember in education that its power, like that of the spirit of the age, which must not be measured by individuals, but by the concentrated mass or majority,—must be judged not by the present, but by the future: a nation or century educated by the same method, presses down the balance quite differently from a casual individual. But we, as ever, desire that Fate, or the Time Spirit, should answer our inquiries by return of post.

§ 20.

I have in this manner, at least I hope so, laid my own opinion, as well as his, before my opponent and predecessor with a respect which is not so common among the learned body as many an opponent of an opponent believes. For the little that he adds about the absorption of the individual in the mass merits not contradiction but affirmation. The uniformity of the masses permits many irregularities in the individual; and although the tables of mortality are correct, no one hopes and fears only by them. On the globe itself mountains disappear, and from these at a distance, the stony path; but he who travels it sees it clearly enough. And when the dear good man, along with his complaints of the ineffectiveness of good education, gives way to complaints of the influence of bad education, he then clearly proves by a capability to be ill-educated a capability to be well-educated; and so education is to be reproached with no want but the want of correct tables of the perturbations of a little wandering star caused by the revolutions of other planets; and will we not readily concede this?

* Longum tempus est decem annorum. Homm. prompt.

And now, worthy Schoolarchy, I should wish to know what further I have to say from this honourable place?

SECOND FRAGMENT.

CHAP. I. Spirit and Principle of Education, § 21—24. CHAP. II. The Individuality of the Ideal Man, § 25—30. CHAP. III. On the Spirit of the Age, § 31—35. CHAP. IV. Religious Education, § 36—38.

CHAPTER I.

SPIRIT AND PRINCIPLE OF EDUCATION.

§ 21.

THE end desired must be known before the way. All means or arts of education will be, in the first instance, determined by the ideal or archetype we entertain of it. But there floats before common parents, instead of one archetype, a whole picture cabinet of ideals, which they impart bit by bit and tattoo into their children. If the secret variances of a large class of ordinary fathers were brought to light, and laid down as a plan of studies, and reading catalogue for a moral education, they would run somewhat after this fashion: In the first hour pure morality must be read to the child, either by myself or the tutor: in the second mixed morality, or that which may be applied to one's own advantage: in the third, "do you not see that your father does so and so?" in the fourth, "you are little and this is only fit for grown up people": in the fifth, "the chief matter is that you should succeed in the world and become something in the state": in the sixth, "not the temporary but the eternal determines the worth of a man": in the seventh, "therefore rather suffer injustice and be kind": in the eighth, "but defend yourself bravely if any one attack you": in the ninth, "do not make such a noise, dear child": in the tenth, "a boy must not sit so quiet": in the eleventh, "you must obey your parents better": in the twelfth, "and educate yourself." So by the hourly change of his principles the father conceals their untenableness and one-sidedness. As for his wife, she is neither like him, nor yet like that harlequin who came on to the stage with a bundle of papers under each arm, and answered to the inquiry what he had under his right arm, "orders," and to what he had under his left, "counter-orders;" but the mother might be much better compared to a giant Briareus, who had a hundred arms, and a bundle of papers under each.

This government of the demi-gods, so frequently and so suddenly changed, proves clearly not only the absence, but also the necessity and the right of a superior god: for in the generality of souls the ideal, without which men would sink down into four-footed beasts, reveals itself rather by inner discord than unison, rather by judgments on others than on itself. But with children the result of this may be, and often has been, various and half-coloured pupils, whom (unless some rare peculiarity makes them hard and uninjurably) the spirit of the age, or the accident of necessity and pleasure, can easily break with its wheel, or even twine round it. The majority of educated men are, therefore, at present an illumination which burns off by fits and starts in the rain, shining with interrupted forms and depicting broken characters.

But the bad and impure spirits of educational systems are yet to be reduced into other divisions. Many parents educate their children only for themselves,—that is, to be pretty blocks, or soul-alarums, which are not set to move or sound when stillness is required. The child has merely to be that on which the teacher can sleep most softly, or drum most loudly; who having something else to do and to enjoy, wishes to be spared the trouble of education, duly but most unreasonably expecting its fruits. Hence these dull sluggards are so often angry because the child is not at once cleverer, more consistent and gentler than themselves. Even zealous children's friends, like statesmen, often resemble inflammable air, which, it is true, gives light itself, but in so doing extinguishes every other: at least a child must often be to them, what a favourite assistant must be to a minister, sometimes only the hand which copies, sometimes a head which can work by itself.

Related to those teachers who wish to be machine-makers, are the educators for appearances and political usefulness. Their maxims, thoroughly carried out, would only produce pupils, or rather sucklings, passively obedient, boneless, well-trained, patient of all things—the thick, hard, human kernel would give place to the soft, sweet fruit-pulp—and the child's clod of earth, into which growing life should breathe a divine spirit, would be kept down and manured as though it were but a corn field,—the edifice of the state would be inhabited by lifeless spinning machines, calculating machines, printing and pumping apparatus, oil mills, and models for mills, pumps and spinning machines, &c. Instead of every child, born without past and without future, beginning in the year one, and bringing with him a first new-year, the state, forsooth, must step into and usurp the place of a remote posterity, which alone could make him spiritually, as well as physically, young again, and substitute for him a system of teaching which only stops his wheels and surrounds them like hardened ice.

Nevertheless the man comes before the citizen, and our future, beyond the world as well as in our own minds, is greater than both: how then have parents, who in the child clothe and bind up the man into a servant,—for instance, into custom-house officers, kitchen-purveyors, jurists, &c.—obtained the right to multiply themselves otherwise than physically, instead of begetting spiritual embryos? Can care of the body impart a right of spiritual starvation, or of good-living such as the devil would prescribe a soul, since no body can outbalance, nay, not even balance, a soul? The ancient German and Spartan custom of killing weak-bodied children is not much crueller than that of propagating weak-minded ones.

§ 22.

Usefulness to others is only separated from usefulness to one's self as dishonesty is from uncharitableness: both are united in self-love. Hedgerows and Hercules-pillars, however perfect, are blameable as soon as they diminish the free world of a future man. If Mengs, by slavery of body and soul, made his son, Raphael Mengs, into a painter—according to Winckelmann the Grecian state only reached art through and for freedom—he did but adopt the old Egyptian custom, that the son must follow the trade of his father, only in its higher branches.

Much of this holds good with regard to domestic orphan-house chaplains, who transform the whole children's training into a church-training and bible-institution, and make free, happy children into bowed-down cloister novices. For the human being is not formed to grow altogether upwards, like plants and deer's horns; nor yet altogether downwards, like feathers and teeth; but like muscles, at both ends at once: so that Bacon's double motto for kings, "Remember that thou art a man, remember that thou art a god, or vice-god," may serve also for children!

Education can neither entirely consist of mere unfolding in general, or, as it is now better called, excitement—for every continued existence unfolds, and every bad education excites, just as oxygen positively irritates—nor in the unfolding of all the powers, because we can never act upon the whole amount of them at once; as little as in the body susceptibility and spontaneity, or the muscular and nervous system, can be strengthened at the same time.

§ 23.

A purely negative education, such as that of Rousseau only seems to be, would at once contradict itself and reality as much as an organic living body full of powers of growth without means of excitement: even the few wild children who have been captured received a positive education from the raging and flying animals around them. A child's coffin only can represent a negative hedge-school, prince's school, and school-door. The purely natural man—whom Rousseau sometimes, indeed very often, confounds with the ideal man, because both are equally pure and distinct from the mere worldly man—grows entirely by excitement. Rousseau, in the first place, prefers arousing and influencing the child by things rather than by men, by impressions rather than by discourses; and, in the second, recommends a more healthy and useful series of excitements, whilst his predecessors in teaching had hastened to use upon the susceptible nature of children the most powerful excitements, such as God, Hell, and the Rod! Only give the souls of children free passage from the limbus * patrum et infantum and Nature, he seems to think, will unfold herself. This, indeed, she does every where and at all times, but only in ages, countries and souls, which possess a marked individuality.

§ 24.

Perhaps we may find the centre and focus of these crossing lines and beams from this point of view: If a modern Greek, without any knowledge of the mighty past, were depicting the present condition of his enslaved race, he would find it approaching the highest step of civilisation, morality and other excellences, until a magic stroke revealed to his astonished eye Greece in the Persian war, or Athens in its glory, or fruitful Sparta, like an empire of the dead, like Elysian fields. What a difference in the same nation, vast as that between gods and men! Nevertheless, those gods are not genii, nor in any way exceptions, but a people, consequently the majority and average of talents. When in history we look round on the heights and mountain ranges where glorified nations dwell, and then down into the abysses where others lie enchained, we say to ourselves,—the heights that a multitude has reached thou also canst reach, if thou canst not descend into the depths. The spiritual existence that a nation, a majority of any people, has embodied and showed forth in glory, must dwell and breathe in every individual, else could he not recognise in it a kindred being.

And so, indeed, it is. Every one of us has within him an ideal man which he strives, from his youth upwards, to cherish or to subdue. This holy Soul-spirit every one beholds most clearly in the blooming time of all his powers—in the season of youth. If only every one were distinctly conscious of what he once wished to become, of how different and much nobler a path and goal his opening eye, compared with his fading one, beheld! For if we believe in any contemporaneous growth of the physical and spiritual man, we must also assume that the blooming season of both occurs simultaneously. Consequently, his own ideal being will appear most clearly to the man (though it be only in vague desires and dreams) in the full bloom of youth. And does not this show itself in the meanest soul which, though fallen during its pilgrimage through sensual and covetous affections, yet once attained a higher hope, and stood within the gates of heaven? At a later period, in the multitude, the ideal being fades day by day, and the man becomes, sinking and overpowered, the mere present, a creature of necessity and neighbourhood. But the universal complaint, "What might I not have become!" confesses the present existence, or the past existence, of an older Adam in paradise, along with and before the old Adam.

* The place whither, according to an old Catholicism, unbaptised innocents went after life.

But the ideal man comes upon the earth as an anthropolithe (a petrified man): to break this stony covering away from so many limbs that the rest can liberate themselves; this is, or should be, Education.

The same normal being who, in every noble soul, remains as house tutor and silently teaches, should be outwardly manifested in the child, and make itself independent, free, and strong. But first of all we must discover what it is. The ideal man of Fénelon—so full of love and full of strength—the ideal man of Cato the younger—so full of strength and full of love—could never exchange, or metamorphose themselves into each other, without spiritual suicide. Consequently, education has in

CHAPTER II.

TO DISCOVER AND TO APPRECIATE THE INDIVIDUALITY OF THE IDEAL MAN.

§ 25.

LET a needful breathing space be granted here! In most languages, like a symbol, the adjective and verb "good" and "be" are irregular. Physical power expresses its superfluity in the variety of genera; hence the temperate zone maintains only 130 distinct quadrupeds, but the torrid 220. The higher kinds of life separate, according to Zimmermann, into more species; thus, beyond the five hundred species of the mineral kingdom, lies the animal world with seven million. It is so with minds. Instead of the uniformity of savage nations in different ages and countries, for instance, of the American Indians and the ancient Germans, is seen the many-branched, varied forms of civilised people in the same climate and period: just as the art of gardening multiplies sorts of flowers in different colours; or time separates a long strip of land in the ocean into islands. In so far a meaning may be attached to the saying of the schoolmen, that every angel is its own species.

§ 26.

Every educator, even the dullest, admits this, and imprints on his pupils this reverence for peculiarities, that is, for his own; at the same time he labours industriously to secure this point—that each be nothing else than his own step-son or bastard self. He allows himself as much individuality as is necessary to eradicate that of others and plant his own in its stead. If, in general, every man is secretly his own copying machine which he applies to others, and if he willingly draws all into ghostly and spiritual relationship with himself as soul's cousins—as, for instance, Homer gladly converted the four quarters of the world into Homerides and Homerists, and Luther into Lutherans—much more will the teacher strive, in the defenceless, unformed souls of children, to impress and reproduce himself; and the father of the body endeavour to be also the father of the spirit. God grant it may seldom succeed! And most fortunately it does not prosper! It is only mediocrity which supplants that of others by its own; that is, one imperceptible individuality by another equally imperceptible: hence the multitude of imitators. From a wood-cut some thousand impressions may easily be taken; but from a copperplate only a tithe of that number.

It were indeed too pitiable for Europe if it were altogether sown with Tituses, as every Titus secretly wishes, or with Semproniuses, as the Semproniuses desire! What a thick, dead sea would be floating along from the usuriously-increasing resemblance of teachers and pupils!

§ 27.

As every teacher, even the rigidest, admits that he highly values two strongly marked individualities—namely, that before the deluge which formed his own, and that own itself—and regards them as the two mountain ranges which give birth to the streams below and the vales of Tempe; and as, moreover, every self-taught man maintains that every thing remarkable in the world has been created by adding and subtracting, but not by transplanting, individualities, some other illusion than that of mere selfishness must be at the foundation of this disregard of the peculiarities of others.

§ 28.

It is, in truth, the excusable error that confuses the ideal with ideals; and which, had it lived during the week of creation, would have created all angels, all Eves, or all Adams. But although there is only one Spirit of Poetry, there are many different forms in which it can incorporate itself—comedies, tragedies, odes, and the thin wasp's body of the epigram; so the same moral genius may become flesh—here as Socrates, there as Luther, here as Phocion, there as John. As no finite can truly reflect the infinite ideal, but only narrowly mirror it back in parts, such parts must necessarily be infinitely various; neither the dew-drop, nor the mirror, nor the ocean reflect the sun in all its greatness, but they each represent it round and bright.

§ 29.

I—God excepted, who is at once the great original I and Thou—is the noblest as well as the most incomprehensible thing which language expresses, or which we contemplate. It is there at once, like the whole world of truth and conscience, which, without I, is nothing. We must ascribe the same thing to God as to unconscious matter when we think of the being of the one, the existence of the other. A second I is, in other respects, even more inconceivable to us than a first.

Every I is a personal existence, consequently a spiritual individuality—for a bodily one is so extended that a portion of the sky, earth, city must belong to it as a body ; —this personal existence does not consist in Fichte's theory of rendering the I objectively subjective, that is, in the change of the reflection of what was first mirrored, and which every where returning cuts off all number and time, so that nothing is explained by it, no reflection by its counter-reflection. Further, it does not consist in an accidental weighing backwards and forwards of single powers ; for, first, to every embodied army a governing and controlling master-spirit is indispensable ; and, secondly, all distinct forces in organic connection rise and fall with the weather-glass, age, &c., alongside the unchanging individuality.

But it is an inner sense of all senses ; as feeling is the sense common to the four external senses. It is that in others on which our reliance, friendship or enmity rests, and is either an enduring inaptitude, or a capacity for the arts of poetry and thought. As the same incomprehensible organic unity, subjecting to itself disjointed matter, governs and acts differently in plants, in animals, and in their every variety, and multiplies itself in organic personal existence, so also does the higher spiritual unity. The theological question of the schools whether the God-man might not have appeared as a woman, a brute animal, or a gourd, is symbolically affirmed by the infinite variety of individual existences in which the Divine Being manifests himself. It is that which unites all æsthetic, moral and intellectual powers into one soul ; and, like the material of light, itself invisible, gives and determines the many-coloured visible universe, whereby first that philosophical pole-word 'practical reason, pure I' ceases only to stand in the zenith of heaven like a pole-star which marks no north, and consequently no quarter of the world.

We should know better how to value and protect this spirit of life, this individuality, if it always stood forth as strongly as in the man of genius. For we all perceive how great a defeat of spirits would arise in a passive war of giants; if, for instance, Kant, Raffaele, Mozart, Cato, Frederick the Great, Charles the Twelfth, Aristophanes, Swift, Tasso, and so forth, were all forced into the same press, and formed in the same mould. Even one man of genius, by the exchange and compensation of individual peculiarities, could only become another in a manner resembling the forcible union of two polypi. But if the primary faculty of an ordinary nature be broken, what can result from it but a perpetual confused wandering about itself—a half imitation arising in spite of, not out of, itself—a parasitical worm living on another being, the mimic of every new example, the slave of every master at his elbow? If a human being be once thrown out of his own individuality into a foreign one, the centre of gravity that held together his whole inner world becomes moveable and wanders from spot to spot, and one oscillation passes into another. In the meantime the teacher has to separate from the individuality which he allows to grow another which he must either bend or guide; the one is that of the head, the other that of the heart. Every intellectual peculiarity, be it mathematical, artistic, philosophical, is a beating heart, which all teaching and gifts only serve as conducting veins to fill with material for working and motion. At this exact point more weight may be added to the preponderating weight of natural disposition; and the teacher must not give in the morning of life a sleeping draught—say to peculiar talents for art. The moral nature, however, must be quite differently treated; if that be melody, this is harmony: you must not enfeeble an Euler by engrafting on him a Petrarch, nor the latter by the former; for no intellectual power can become too great, and no painter too great a painter. But every moral faculty needs to have its boundaries fixed in order to the cultivation of its balancing powers; and Frederick the Great may take his flute, and Napoleon his Ossian. Here education may, for instance, deliver sermons on peace to the heroic character, and charge with electric thunder the disposition of a Siegwart. So one might—since, with girls, head and heart are reciprocal—frequently put a cooking spoon into the hand of the boy of genius, and into that of the little cook by birth some romantic feather from a poet's wing. For the rest let it be a law that, as every faculty is holy, none must be weakened in itself, but only have its opposing one aroused; by which means it is added harmoniously to the whole.

So, for instance, a weakly affectionate heart must not be hardened, but its sense of honour and purity must be strengthened; the daring spirit must not be rudely checked and made timid, but only taught to be loving and prudent.

The conditions may now be required of me under which is to be formed the character of the child, and also that of the prize or ideal man into which he is to be fashioned. But for that purpose one book among the endless multitude of books would not serve; moreover the books must possess the rare gift of being interpreters of the dreams and symbols of the closely-folded child's character; which, in a child, who does not display everything matured as a grown-up man, but only budding, would be as difficult to discover as a butterfly in the chrysalis to all who are not Swammerdams. But alas! three things are very difficult to discover and to impart—to have a character—to draw one—to guess one. To ordinary teachers a naughty trick seems a wicked nature—a pimple or a pock-mark as parts of the countenance.

If one must translate the prize and ideal man into words, one might perhaps say, that it is the harmonious maximum of all individual qualities taken together, which, without regard to the resemblance of the harmony, is yet connected in all its different parts, as one tone in music is with another. Whosoever now, out of the musical abcdefg, should change, for instance, a piece set in a to b, would injure the piece much, but not so much as a teacher who would convert the all-variously arranged natures of children into one uniform tone.

§ 30.

To elevate above the spirit of the age must be regarded as the end of education; and this must stand clearly developed before us ere we mark out the appointed road. The child is not to be educated for the present—for this is done without our aid unceasingly and powerfully—but for the remote future, and often in opposition to the immediate future. The spirit which is to be shunned must be known. Permit me then a

THIRD CHAPTER,

ON THE SPIRIT OF THE AGE.

§ 31.

You invoke the Spirit of the Age freely and boldly, but let it truly appear before us in your discourse, and do you answer? Since time separates into ages, as the rainbow into falling drops, indicate the greatness of the age of whose indwelling spirit you speak. Has it a century of duration; and by what chronology is it reckoned—the Jewish, the Christian, the Turkish, or the French? Does not the expression “spirit of the century” easily escape the lips of a man because he, born in a century and partly measuring one with his life, really means nothing more by “age” than the little day-span which the eternal sun describes from the morning to the evening of his life?—Or does the age extend from one great event (the Reformation, for instance) to another, so that the spirit of the first vanishes as soon as the second is born? And what revolution will be considered by you the animating one of the age—a philosophical, a moral, a poetical, or a political one?

Further: is not every spirit of the age less changing than flying,—indeed, already flown; what might be more properly called the spirit of that immediately preceding? For its traces presuppose that it is already gone, consequently gone further. And only from lofty heights can the backward road be surveyed and the future estimated.

But since the same period unfolds at the present time a totally different spirit in Saturn—in his satellites—in his rings—upon all the countless worlds of the present; and again in London, Paris, Warsaw; and since it follows that the present moment of time must have a million different spirits of the age,—I would ask you where the invoked spirit of the age is clearly manifested—in Germany, France, or where? As, before, you found it difficult to mark out its limits in time, so will you now to determine them in space.

I partly spare you the great question which concerns every one, yourself among the number,—how you, how all encircled in the same age, can raise yourselves so far above its waves as to be able to observe its course, not merely to feel its dark irresistible march? And does not the stream which bears you lead into an ocean whose movements you cannot measure because it has no shore?

§ 32:

What we call spirit of the age our ancestors called the end of the world, the latest times, signs of the last day, kingdom of the devil and of Antichrist. Mere melancholy names! No golden or innocent age ever called itself golden, but only expected one; and an age of lead expected one of arsenic:—only the past glitters, as ships occasionally draw after them a shining train. But the former interpretations of dreams and gazings into the present—would that some one would collect such a dream book of departed great spirits!—teach us to mistrust those now made. If man, from the observation of the three quarters of the globe, could not prophetically construct the fourth from the combinations of matter, far less can he divine a future from the more complicated ones of spirit. For man is feeble and poor: his star-reading of the future—a mere strengthening or weakening of the present—sees only a crescent moon in the sky, which waxes and wanes in unison with himself, but no sun. Every one regards his own life as the new-year's eve of time, and also, like the superstitious, his dreams, woven from memories, as prophecies for the year. Thence there always comes—not the foretold good or evil, nor yet its opposite, but something quite different, which receives the prophecies and their objects as an ocean does the rivers, and resolves them into the circle of its waves. For, in the moment, when you are prophesying in the desert, the fine seed-pollen of an oak falls upon the earth and, in a century, grows up to be a forest. How, indeed, could man accurately divine any approaching age without at the same time knowing and depicting all after times? He, for instance, who, from the present course and position of the winds, clouds and planets during one academical half year, could accurately guess the weather of a second, might and must be able, from the data he had foretold, to decipher the third season's weather, and from that every succeeding one—supposing no intervention;—but there do always intervene comets, earthquakes, the clearing of forests, or the growth of new ones, and all the other power of the Almighty. In the same way, before the eye of the seer, one century after another must be produced in regular order, consequently thousands of years, and finally, the whole time which can dwell upon an earth; supposing as has been already said, nothing intervenes. But, heavens! What is there does not intervene! The prophet himself—and the freedom of the spiritual world—and the Almighty, who here withdraws and there sends forth spirits and suns. Thus it is that every one lives so completely in a spiritual twilight (a beautiful word for that dusky time of day) that God himself decides which of the two contending lights shall gain the victory by a new one from the sun or the moon, which men so frequently mistake the one for the other.

§ 33.

How, indeed, were this foregoing two-and-thirtieth paragraph to be written or to be comprehended, if something more were not added about it; namely, a three-and-thirtieth which follows after it? The older the world grows, the more complacently can it, and will it, adopt the prophesying character of an elder. From the fore-world a spirit speaks an ancient language to us, which we should not understand if it were not born with us. It is the Spirit of Eternity, which judges and overlooks every spirit of time. And what does it say of the present?

Very hard words:—It says that the age can now more easily raise up a great people than a great man; because the powerful union springing from civilisation joins together the men of one spirit like the vapour-drops of a huge steam engine; so that even war is now only a war-game between two living creatures. Something, it says, must have decayed in our age, for even the mighty earthquake of the Revolution before which for centuries, as before a physical earthquake, an infinite multitude of worms had crept out of the ground and covered it, has produced and left behind it nothing greater than pretty wings on these said worms. The Spirit of Eternity, which judges the heart and the world, strongly declares what spirit is wanting to the present men inspired by the senses, to these fire-worshippers of the passions,—the Holy one of Him who is above the earth. The ruins of His temple sink lower and lower into the present earth. Prayer is thought to draw along with it the false lights of fanaticism. The apprehension and belief in what is beyond the world, which formerly extended its roots under the foulest ages, bear no fruits in our pure thin air. If, formerly, religion was in war, there is now no longer war in religion—there has grown for us out of the world a mighty edifice, out of ether a cloud, out of God a mere power, out of heaven a coffin!

At last the Spirit of Eternity holds up before us our shamelessness, by which we, in our darkness, have permitted to play, as a festive illumination, the flames of anger, love and desire, from which all religions, all ancient nations, all great men have held themselves aloof, or regarded with shame: and it says that we, living only in our hate and hunger, like other decaying corpses, only retain our teeth uninjured, the instruments both of revenge and enjoyment. Passion belongs of right to the sickness of the age; nowhere is found so much impatience, carelessness, indulgence towards self and unrelenting selfishness towards others as on the sick-bed. Now this century lies upon a sick bed. As among the Spartans the men cut away a full prominent breast as something womanish,* so is the same thing done now in spiritual matters under the same pretext; and the heart must be as hard as the cavity of the chest above it. Finally, there are some very cultivated men who split themselves in opposite directions towards heaven and hell, as a salamander cut in two runs forward with its front, backwards with its hind part.

* In Russia in former times it was the fashion for men to stuff out their clothing into large false breasts.

§ 34.

So speaks the severe spirit within us, the Eternal one; but it becomes milder if we hear it to the end. Every heartfelt lamentation and weeping over any age points, like a spring on a mountain, to some higher mountain or peak: only those nations remain sunk in their lethargy who go in the same dull path from age to age, not lamenting over themselves but over others: and those who suffer from the mental falling-sickness of the French philosophy have, like bodily epileptics, no consciousness of their malady, but only pride in their strength. Sorrow of the spirit (as Night, according to the Greeks) is the mother of gods; though that of the body is a dark mist bringing poison and death. The bold and soaring thought of the Talmudists—that even God prays; like that of the Greeks, that Jupiter was subject to Fate—receives a meaning from the lofty though often conquered longings of the soul, which the Infinite himself has planted within us.

One religion after another fades away, but the religious sense, which created them all, can never become dead to humanity: consequently, it will only manifest and lead its future life in more purified forms. The saying of Tyrtaeus,* that God, in the commencement, appeared to men in their own likeness, then as a voice, and afterwards only in dreams and by inspiration (or spiritual illumination), has a beautiful signification for ours, and all future ages, if by dream we understand poetry, and by illumination, philosophy. So long as the word God endures in a language so long will it direct the eyes of men upwards. It is with the Eternal as with the sun, which, if but its smallest part can shine un-eclipsed, prolongs the day and gives its rounded image in the dark chamber. Even in France, which could for a short time observe a total ~~eclipse~~ of the sun, arose a Chateaubriand, a St. Martin and his admirers, and other kindred spirits. Our present age is indeed a criticising and a critical one, wavering between the desire and the inability to believe,—a chaos of times struggling against one another: but even a chaotic world must have a centre, revolution round that point, and an atmosphere; there is no such thing as mere disorder and confusion, but even that presupposes its opposite in order to begin. The present religious wars on paper and in the brain—very different from former ones, which were tempests full of heat, rage, devastation and fertilisation—rather resemble the northern lights (thunder and lightning of the higher and colder quarters of the sky) full of noisy lights without blows, full of strange shapes and full of frost, without rain and in the night. Does not in fact, the bold self-consciousness—the life of this age—extend still further the original character of man and mind! And can the character of men, the mental waking, ever be too much awake? At present it is only not sufficiently so; for an object is necessary to reflection, as its absence is to thoughtlessness; and the common minds of the age are too impoverished to give a rich field to reflection. But there is one strange, ever-returning spectacle: That every age has regarded the dawning of new light as the fire-destroyer of morality; while that very age itself, with heart uninjured, finds itself raised one degree of light above the preceding! Is it, perhaps, that as light travels faster than heat, and as it is more easy to work upon the head than on the heart, the burst of light, by its suddenness, always appears inimical to the unprepared heart?

* Tyrtaeus de Apparitione Dei, c. 17.

To the present age is ascribed productiveness and changeableness of opinions, and at the same time indifference to opinions. But that cannot arise from this: no man in all corrupted Europe can be indifferent to truth as such; for it, in the last resort, decides upon his life; but every one is at last become cold and shy towards the erring teachers and preachers of truth. Take the hardest heart and brain which withers away in any capital city, and only give him the certainty that the spirit which approaches brings down from eternity the key which opens and shuts the so weighty gates of his life-prison of death, and of heaven,—and the dried-up worldly man so long as he has a care or a wish, must seek for a truth which can reveal to him that spirit.

The present march of light indicates anything rather than standing still; and it is only this which begets and immortalizes poison, as it is on stagnant air that tempests and whirlwinds break. Certainly we are very little able to determine in what manner a brighter age than that we have experienced will be educed from the present troublous fermentation. Every varied age,—and therefore our own, ~~is~~ is only a spiritual climate for an approaching spiritual seed; but we do not know what foreign seed heaven will cast into it.

Every sin appears new and near, as in painting black stands out most strongly; man is readily accustomed to the repetition of love, but not to the repetition of injustice. Thence every one regards his own age as morally worse, and intellectually better than it really is; for in science the new is an advance; but in morals the new, as a contradiction to our inner ideals and our historic idols, is ever a retrogression. As the errors of nations in past ages, unlike decorative paintings, seem very distorted and shapeless, because distance hides from us their finer and true completeness; so, on the other side, the black sin-stains of the past, of the Roman and Spartan for example, show softened and rounded, and, as on a moon, the high rugged shadow of the past falls round and transparent on the present. For instance, if men estimate the worth of the age after a war, that most ancient barbarism of humanity, and especially after the bad innovations consequent upon it, then the spirit of the age rises before this touch of death in frightful illumination and distortion. But war, as the general storm in the moral world, and the tongue and heart-confusing Babel of the physical world, had in every age repeated injustices which only appeared new because each had heard from the preceding age nothing save the number of the vanquished armies and towns; but experienced in itself the sufferings. On the contrary, our age has, more than any other, besides a certain humanity of war in respect to life, also a growing insight into its unlawfulness.

Among nations the head has at all times preceded the heart by centuries, as in the slave trade; yes, by thousands of years, as will perhaps be the case in war.

§ 35.

Since modes of life beget modes of thought, and opinions actions, and head and heart, spiritually as well as physically, mutually improve or injure each other, so has fate, when both are to be healed at once, only one cure, and that a long one; the harsh viper-like cure of affliction. If sorrow purify men, why not nations? Certainly, and it is for this reason that men perceive it less, if wounds and fast-days improve the one, battle-fields and centuries of penance do the other, and generations must sink sadly and sorrowfully to destruction. Not by a splendid martial funeral with firing of cannon, but by a battle of the elements, is the sky made blue and the earth fruitful. At the same time in history, as in the almanac, the thick dull St. Thomas's day is shorter than the bright warm St. John's day, although both conduct into new seasons of the year.

But until, and in order that our children and children's children may pass through the winter centuries, this it is that nearly affects us and education. We must meet the great entanglement by partial unravellings. The child must be armed against the future; yes, even against the close pressing present, with a counterbalancing weight of three powers against the three weaknesses of the will, of love, and of religion. Our age has only a passionate power of desire, like the brute, the madman, the sick, and each weakest thing; but not that energy of will which was most nobly displayed in Sparta and Rome—in the Stoa, and in the early Church. And now the arts, as the state formerly did, must harden the young spirit and subdue the will. The uniform colour of a stoic oneness must extinguish the vulgar praise of the various tiger-spots and serpent brilliancy of passionate agitation; the girl and the boy must learn that there is something in the ocean higher than its waves; namely, a Christ who calls upon them. When the stoic energy of will is formed, there is then a loving spirit made free. Fear is more egoistic than courage because it is more needy; the exhausting parasitical plants of selfishness only attach themselves to decayed trunks. But power kills what is feeble, as strong decoction of quassia kills flies. If man, created more for love than for opposition, can only attain a free clear space, he possesses love; and that is love of the strongest kind, which builds on rocks, not on waves. Let the bodily heart be the pattern of the spiritual; easily injured, sensitive, lively, and warm, but yet a tough free-beating muscle behind the lattice work of bones, and its tender nerves are difficult to find.

As there is no contest about the nature of power and love, but only about the ways to attain them (these, however, penetrate deep into the matter); but as about religion, on the contrary, the doubts of many must first be solved as to whether there be only one, and whether different paths lead to it; so the third point, according to which the child is to be educated against the age, must aim at placing before the soul first, not the means, but the right to educate religiously. Power and love are two opposing forces of the inner man; but religion is the equal union of both, the man within the man.

CHAPTER IV.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.

§ 36.

RELIGION is now no longer a national, but a household goddess. Our little age is a magnifying glass, through which, as is well known, the exalted appears flat and level. Since we now send all our children out into a town-like futurity, in which the broken church bells only dully call the populous market place to the silent church, we must, more anxiously than ever, seek to give them a house of prayer in the heart, and folded hands, and humility before the invisible world, if we believe in a religion and distinguish it from morality.

The history of nations determines that there is this separation. There have been many religions; but there is only one code of morals; in those a god has always become a man, and, therefore, been concealed under many folds; in this a man has become God, and been clearly manifested. The middle ages had, along with moral churchyards full of dead bodies and rank vegetation, full of cruelty and lust, also churches and spires for the religious sentiment. In our times, on the contrary, the sacred groves of religion are cleared and trodden down, and the public roads of morality made straighter and more sure. Ah! a contemporaneous decline of religion and morality would be too sad! The age will conceal the departure of one sense for the heavenly by the greater sharpness and severity of that for the moral; and at least by small, delicate, and therefore more numerous sides, acquire a moral breadth. As men in towns, where they cannot build in width build in height, so we, reversing the matter, build in width instead of in height; more over the earth than into the sky. We may truly say that France, in general, with its chemical, physical, mathematical and warlike noon-day lights, can hardly behold in the starry heaven of religion more than a last shadowy quarter of the moon, resembling rather a cloud than a star; whilst in England and Germany religion is still at least seen as a distant milky-way, and on paper as a star chart; but one could not, without injustice, describe the religious difference of these countries as a moral one. Was, therefore, and is Stoicism, this noble son of morality, as love is its daughter, in and by itself religion? If the difference between religion and morality were not founded on something true, it were incomprehensible how so many fanatical sects of the early and later centuries—for instance, the Quietists—could have arrived at the illusive belief that in the inmost enthusiastic love of God enduring sinfulness consumes itself, so that none remains as it does in the worldly man. It is true that religiousness, in its highest degree, is identical with morality, and this with that; but that equally pertains to the highest degree of every power; and every sun wanders only through the heavenly ether. All that is divine must as certainly meet and unite with morality, as science and art; so that in every soul rescued from sin there must as certainly be religious Tabernacles as there are hills in the crater of Etna.

It must be understood that we do not here speak of that beggar religion which only prays and sings before the gates of heaven until the Peter's pence are bestowed upon it.

§ 37.

What then is Religion? Prayerfully pronounce the answer. The Belief in God. It is not only a sense for the holy, and a belief in the invisible, but a presentiment of it, without which no kingdom of the incomprehensible were conceivable. Efface God from the heart, and everything which lies above or below the earth is only a recurring enlargement of it; that which is above the earth would become only a higher grade of mechanism and, consequently, earthly.

If the question be put, What do you mean by the word God? I will let an old German, Sebastian Frank,* answer: "God is an unutterable sigh lying in the depths of the soul." A beautiful, profound saying! But as the unutterable dwells in every soul, it must be manifested to every stranger by words. Let me give to the God-fearing Spirit of every age the words of our times, and listen to what it says of religion.

"Religion is, in the beginning, the learning of God;—hence the great name Divine, one learned about God—truly religion is the blessedness arising from a knowledge of God. Without God we are lonely throughout eternity; but if we have God we are more warmly, more intimately, more steadfastly united than by friendship and love. I am then no longer alone with my spirit. Its great first Friend, the Everlasting, whom it recognises, the inborn Friend of its innermost soul will abandon it as little as it can do itself, and in the midst of the impure or empty whirl of trifles and of sins, on the market-place and the battle-field, I stand with closed breast in which the Almighty and All-holy speaks to me, and reposes before me like a near sun, behind which the outer world lies in darkness.

* "Zinkrefs der Teutschen scharfsinnige kluge Sprüche," 1639.

I have entered into His church, the temple of the universe, and remain therein blessed, devout, pious, even if the temple should become dark, or cold, or undermined by graves. What I do, or suffer, is no sacrifice for Him, it counts as little as one made to myself; I love Him whether I suffer or not. The flame from heaven falls on the altar of sacrifice and consumes the beast, but the flame and the priest remain. If my great Friend demand something from me the heaven and the earth seem glorious to me, and I am happy as He is; if He deny me anything, it is a storm on the ocean, but it is spanned by rainbows, and I recognise above it the kindly sun which has no tempestuous sides, but only sunshiny ones. A code of morality only rules bad, unloving souls, in order that they may first become better and afterwards good. But the loving contemplation of the soul's first Friend, who abundantly animates those laws, banishes not merely the bad thoughts which conquer, but those also which tempt. As the eagle flies high above the highest mountains, so does true love above struggling duty.

"Where religion is, there both men, and beasts, and the whole world are loved. Every being is a moving temple of the Infinite. Everything earthly purifies and stuns itself in the thought of Him; only one earthly thing remains darkly existent, sin; the true annihilation of the soul; or the unceasing Tantalus, Satan.

"One may with some right speak to others about that of which one never speaks to oneself: for within me He is so near me that I can with difficulty separate His word and mine; for from the second self my own is reflected, and I only find Him who illumines myself as well as the dew-drop.

"But if it be no error to believe all this, how wilt Thou, O God! appear to those who have overcome the agitations of life in the one still hour of death; then, when world after world, human being after human being, has disappeared, and nothing but the Eternal remains with the mortal-immortal? He who brings God with him into the darkest night cannot know what it is to die; for he beholds the Eternal Star in the boundless distance."

If you do not believe that religion is the poetry of morality, the lofty, nay, the loftiest, style of life, think less of the mystic enthusiasts, who, as despisers of the doctrine of happiness, were willing to be damned if but the love of God remained within them, than of Fénelon : could you be purer, more steadfast, richer, more self-sacrificing, or more blessed than he, at once child, woman, man, and angel ?

§ 38.

How then is the child to be led into the new world of religion ? Not by arguments. Every step of finite knowledge can be reached by learning and perseverance ; but the Infinite, which supports the end of those steps, can only be seen at a glance, not reached by counting ; we arrive there by wings, not by steps. To prove, as to doubt, the existence of God, is to prove or to doubt the existence of existence. The soul seeks its Original—not merely an original world near the present one—that freedom from which finite existence received its laws : but it could not seek if it did not know and did not possess. The greatness of religion is not confined to one opinion, it extends over the whole man ; as greatness, of whatever kind, resembles the rock-bound mountains, one of which is never found alone in a level plain, but rises up among neighbouring heights and extends into a mountain range.

As there is no corporeal world without a spiritual soul (or no resurrection-ashes without a phoenix), so there is no soul or spiritual world without God ; just as in the same way there is no fate without a Providence.

The purest distinction of man from the lower animals is neither reflection nor morality ; for sparks at least of these stars shine in the ranks of the brute creation ; but religion, which is neither merely opinion nor disposition, but the heart of the inner man, and therefore the groundwork of the rest. In the middle ages, so dark for other knowledge, religion, like the sky at night, hung nearer to the earth and extended brightly over it ; whereas, to us, God like the sun in the day-time, seems only like the key-stone of the arch of heaven. The old chronicler introduces bloody rain—monsters—fights of birds—children's games—fights of locusts—yes, even sudden deaths—among the great events of the world, as important signs, as the smoke clouds of an impending war; and war, a still more important sign, had, as a judgment upon sin, its heavenly as well as its earthly origin. At the same time this parallelism, or rather predetermined harmony between earth and heaven, was at least more consistent than the new physical influence which allows not the day watch of one man but the thousand-yearred watch of the history of the world to be fixed by a God, resembling a theatrical one, only that he is not a mock sun, but a real sun; as if the difference between the earthly and the heavenly rested only on degrees of greatness; and as if the admission or exclusion of the Infinite did not equally apply to the whole of the finite universe and to its smallest part!

He who possesses religion finds a Providence not more truly in the history of the world than in his own family history: the rainbow, which hangs a glittering circle in the heights of heaven, is also formed by the same sun in the dew-drop of a lowly flower. The diffident modesty of present individuals who prefer leaving the care of themselves to blind fate, rather than to watchful Providence, testifies less to unbelief and self-depreciation than to the consciousness of not believing and acting piously.

Herder proves that all nations have received writing and their earliest forms of civilisation from the teachings of religion; but does he not thereby prove something further?—namely, this: That in nations and consequently in men, the ideal is older than the real?—that so the child is nearer the highest than the lowest, for that lies in him; and that we reckon time by the stars and the sun earlier than by the town clock; and that the Godhead, as once in paradise, so now in the desert, impresses His image on man before he can discolour it, and so afterwards he can never lose or be without it? Every thing holy is before what is unholy; guilt presupposes innocence, not the reverse; angels, but not fallen ones, were created. Hence man does not properly rise to the highest, but first sinks gradually down from it, and then afterwards rises again: ~~The~~ child can never be considered too innocent and good. It is thus that the Infinite Being appears to nations and individuals earlier than the finite, yea than infinite space:

as the almighty power of young nature produced, according to Schelling, the fixed suns earlier than the worlds which roll round them. If a whole system of religious metaphysics did not dreamingly sleep within the child, how could the mental contemplation of infinity, God, eternity, holiness, &c., be imparted to him, since we cannot communicate it by outward means, and indeed have nothing for that purpose but words, which have not the power of creating, but only of arousing? The dying and the fainting hear inward music which no outward object gives; and ideas are such inward tones.* In general even the questions, that is the objects of proper metaphysics, are among children, as among the uneducated classes, much more active and common than one supposes, only under different names; and the four-year old child will ask, what lies behind the curtains of the hidden world, whence is the origin of God? &c. For instance, in children talking together, the author heard his five-year old boy philosophise and say, "God has made every thing, so if one offers Him any thing He has made it;" whereupon his four-year old sister said, "He makes nothing;" and he answered, "He makes nothing, because He has made it." Again; the seven-year old sister maintained, if the soul in the head had another set of arms, legs and a head, another soul must dwell in that, and this again would have a head, and so on for ever.†

If Rousseau give up God, and consequently religion, as the late inheritance of a matured age, he can, except in the case of great souls, expect no more religious inspiration and love than a Parisian father, who, after the fashion of some nations, never sees his son till he no longer needs a father, can expect filial affection.‡ When, indeed, could

* So the fear of ghosts, this unceasing dread, which without any outward cause—by that only corporeal fear is produced—obtains the mastery, and makes men stiff and cold.

† While writing this, the above mentioned four, now six-year old child said, "Counting has a one and begins, and what begins must also leave off." At last she showed me a stick and asked—"Does it not leave off on all sides?"

‡ At least Mercier says that the fashionable Parisians, even the women, do not see their children, who are brought up in the country, until they are fully grown.

the Most Holy take deeper root than in the most holy age of innocence, or* that which shall have eternal influence, than in the age which never forgets? Not the clouds of the fore or afternoon, but the overcast or blue sky of the morning, decides upon the fairness of the day.

But as the first rule to be observed by any one who will give something is, that he must himself have it; so it is true, that no one can teach religion who has it not: mature hypocrisy, or lip-religion, can beget nothing but immature; such a mock-sun can neither warm nor give light, and an acoustic deception returns every optic one. He who has no God in heaven and in his own heart can, without immorality, believe himself bound by no morality (though perhaps for the sake of utility) to implant in his children a nothing which he has already torn from himself and which he afterwards intends to eradicate from them. But, properly, neither belief in the morality of a religious lie, nor in its political advantages, sows deceit in the trusting open heart of childhood; that is only done by the selfish weakness which willingly makes terms at once with God and the devil: that argumentum a tuto * (a keeping open of a back-door into heaven, worthy, but for its wounding of reason and morality, of a very opposite name) does not rank, thank God! among the sins of our age.

The younger a child is the less let him hear the Un-speakable named, who only by a word becomes to him the speakable: but let him behold His symbols. The sublime is the temple step of religion, as the stars are of immeasurable space. When what is mighty appears in nature—a storm, thunder, the starry firmament, death—then utter the word God before the child. A great misfortune, a great blessing, a great crime, a noble action, are building sites for a child's church.

Show every where to the child, as well as on the borders of the holy land of religion, devotional and holy sentiments; these pass over and at last unveil for him the object; just as if you are alarmed he is so too, without knowing why. Newton, who uncovered his head when the Greatest Name was uttered, would have been, without saying a word, a teacher of religion to children. Not with them, but only before them, should you pray your own prayers, that is, think aloud of God; but their own you should pray with them. A stated exaltation and emotion is a desecrated one. The prayers of children are empty and cold, and are in fact only remains of the Jewish-Christian belief in sacrifices which will reconcile and win the favour of God by means of innocent beings, not of innocence; and the child secretly regards the God whom you give him by word of mouth as the Kamtschatkadale and every savage does his. A grace before meat must make every child deceitful. As he grows older let a day of prayer, or of any religious observances, become more rare, but on that account more solemn; what the first affecting Lord's Supper is to the child, that let every hour be in which you consecrate his heart to religion. Let children go to church but rarely, for you might as well take them to hear an oratorio of Klopstock or of Handel, as that of the church; but when you do take them, impress on them the value of a sympathy with the devotional sentiments of their parents. Indeed, I would rather—since as yet there is no special public worship of God and no special preachers for children—you should lead them on the great days of the seasons, or of human life, merely into the empty temple, and show them the holy place of their elders. If you add to that, twilight, night, the organ, singing, a father's preaching, you will at least leave behind on the young heart more religious consecration by that one church-going than you could on an old one by a whole year of church-attending. After these considerations it makes one's heart ache to think of that already nearly abandoned custom, which some however kindly wish back,* I mean that of setting the children and young people to take down the sermon, at least an outline of it, in church and afterwards to write it out fully at home or at school. Although this nearly borders on jest, we will ask in earnest, whether this must not convert the religious sincerity of fellow-feeling into a mere anatomy and skeleton, and draw down what is holy and the aspiration of the heart into a means of exercising the understanding, and hold every emotion at a distance because feeling might hinder writing? It were, perhaps, something about as good if a young woman made a short pragmatic abstract of her lover's declaration of love; or a soldier, of the fiery speech of his leader before battle; or an evangelist, a neat exposition of Christ's sermon on the mount with all its subdivisions. When teachers thus convert all the highest ends into new means and ways, that is to say backwards, do they not spiritually use spiritual things, as the modern Romans really do triumphal arches and temples of Jupiter, which they degrade into wash-houses?

* The Safety and Exigency Creed.

* Professor Petri in the new "Bibliothek für Pädagogik," &c., July, 1811, who appeals to Reinhard's Youthful example thereanent.

For the poor children of the people, whose parents are still pupils of the Sunday, and for whom, as a set-off to the deep desert of the week, a raising hand must not fail to lift them out of their low cloudy heaven, is a public church service more necessary than for the children of the upper classes. The church walls, the pulpit, the organ, are to them the symbols of the Divine; and as a symbol it is indifferent whether it be the village church or the temple of nature. And do we ourselves know where, or if ever, the Unsearchable can terminate the ascending scale of His symbols? Does not the higher spirit require again a higher symbol?

Let the eye of the pupil, even where he only sees outer walls and forms, yet every where gaze into the Holy of Holies of religion, which the church-goer must bring with him into the church as the temple-court of the heart. Let every foreign exercise of religion, and every outward preparation for it, be as holy to him as his own. Let the Protestant child hold the Catholic saints' images by the road-side to be as worthy of reverence as the ancient oak-forests of his forefathers; let him receive different religions as lovingly as different languages, in which but one spirit of humanity is expressed. Every genius is all-powerful in his own language, every heart in its own religion.

But let not fear create the God of childhood: fear was itself created by a wicked spirit; shall the devil become the grandfather of God?

He who seeks something higher in its own nature, not merely in degree, than what life can give or take away, that man has religion, though he only believe in infinity, not in the Infinite, only in eternity, without an Eternal; as if, in opposition to other artists, he did not paint the sun with a human countenance, but rounded off this to resemble the former. For he who regards all life as holy and wonderful, whether it dwell in animals, or, still lower, in plants; he who, like Spinoza, by means of his noble soul floats and rests less upon steps and heights than upon wings, whence the surrounding universe—the stationary and that moving by law—changes into one immense Light, Life and Being, and surrounds him, so that he feels absorbed in the great light and wishes to be nothing but a ray in the immeasurable splendour; such a man has, and consequently imparts, religion; since the highest ever reflects and paints the highest, even though formless, behind the eye.

True unbelief relates to no individual propositions, or counter-propositions, but to blindness towards the whole. Excite in the child the all-powerful perception of the whole, in opposition to the selfish perception of the parts, and then you raise the man above the world, the eternal above the transitory. Place in the child's hand our religious book; but do not give the explanation after, but before the reading, so that the strange form may enter the young soul as something entire. Why should misunderstanding be the precursor of understanding? Without wonder there is no faith; and the belief in the marvellous is itself an inward faith. You must impart a sun-beam of its origin to every thing great which comes before you,—to genius, to love, to every power; only things weak and curved consist of steps, stairs and torture-ladders; the true ladder of heaven has no steps. At least two miracles, or revelations, remain for you uncontested in this age which deadens sound with un-reverberating materials; they resemble an Old and a New Testament, and are these—the birth of finite being, and the birth of life within the hard wood of matter. For in one inexplicable thing every other is involved, and one miracle annihilates the whole philosophy. Consequently you do not act the part of a hypocrite when you permit the child to draw any thing out of the book of religion, or the secret book of nature, which you cannot explain. Living religion grows not by the doctrines, but by the narratives, of the Bible. the best Christian religious doctrine is the life of Christ; and, after that, the sufferings and deaths of his followers, even those not related in Holy Writ.

In the fair spring of the religious admission of the child among his elders, an important one, since then first he comes publicly before the altar and acts with all the rights of an independent being; in this never-recurring time when the dawn of life suddenly breaks into the morning red, and thereby announces the newness of love and of nature; there is no better priest to lead and accompany the young soul with dancing and great joy to the high altar of religion, than the poet who annihilates a mortal world to build on it an immortal; so that our life on earth may resemble those polar lands which, so void of animals and flowers, so cold and colourless, yet, after sunless days, display rich nights in which heaven pours down its gifts upon the earth, and where the northern or polar lights fill the whole blue with fire-colours, jewels, thunder, splendid tropical storms, and remind the inhabitants of the cold earth of that which lives above them.

THIRD FRAGMENT.

CHAP. I. Digression upon the beginning of Man and of Education, § 39—42. CHAP. II. Joyousness of Children, § 43—45. CHAP. III Their Games, § 46—54. CHAP. IV. Their Dances, § 55—57. CHAP. V. Music, § 58—60. CHAP. VI. Commanding, Forbidding, § 61—63. CHAP. VII. Punishments, § 64, 65. CHAP. VIII. Passionate Crying of Children, § 66—70. CHAP. IX. On the Trustfulness of Children, § 71, 72.

CHAPTER I.

THE BEGINNING OF EDUCATION.

§ 39.

WHEN does Education begin its work? With the first breath of the child but no sooner. The Light of the Soul, which we call Life, issuing from I know not what sunny cloud, strikes upon the bodily world and moulds the rough mass into its dwelling place, which glows on until Death, by the nearness of another world, allures it still further on. In this primitive moment—for from it the pulse reckons its first beat, even though time be elsewhere already—is the invisible beam of individual existence broken into the coloured spectrum of his bodily appearance: the dispositions, the sex, yes, even the resemblance to the father's and mother's countenances are distinguished by yet unseen lines. For the unity of the organism, of this state within the world, that is, the embodied system of laws, cannot form itself piece-meal like the individual parts which it governs: for example, the forming influence, which moulds the transparent child's face like its father's or its grandfather's, cannot lie in the nine-months' fancies of the mother, but must exist in the child itself.

The two life-chains of the parents are somewhat different; especially the last link, from which the spark of the new man issued in order to animate the physical clod of earth into an Adam. When one considers how little has yet been done for the races of the coming world (except in the case of horses, sheep and canary birds) not even observations, to say nothing of institutions, merely for a cradle rather than for the child in the cradle;—how the connexions of the sexes, of years, of months, of hours, are so lawlessly and carelessly forgotten and injured when the foundation stones of centuries are laid;—how here the giddy, sensual man requires more laws than the unchanging beast which moves straight on in the leading strings of instinct and of health, and when one considers how the divergence—growing by means of culture wider and wider—from savages and aborigines, who still retained the advantages of beasts, has doubled lawlessness and ignorance of law—and how the world becomes continually more clamorous in desire, more indifferent to wisdom; one must, from a carelessness for moral requisitions, which contents itself only with the bare fulfilment of the ten commandments for ruffians, finally come to the conclusion, that men seek to settle with morality as with a creditor. It is true that the noble-hearted instructor Schwarz would maintain that the Holy Spirit takes cognizance of the future for sin in the highest love; but he is right only for the highest first love; and only in the case of want of thought or knowledge. A physician, for example, on the other hand, has not this want of knowledge. And may not a state, at any rate, like an elder, prescribe for all, with its cold ever-during hand, laws which a loving individual would never have thought of making, and yet is obliged to obey; just as the law-book, not a pair of lovers, contemplates divorce.

For the rest we may well venture to complain that Nature, during the “twelve holy nights” in which, as creatress she wanders alone with her youngest creatures, makes it too difficult even for the conscientious not to steal and murder in the dark. At every step down the deep gloomy ladder of futurity up which men and ages ascend, conscience calls “Here is a man, there perhaps a genius, the heaven of his people;" but we, like night wanderers, must spare the known and injure the unknown.

Since parents play so prominent a part in the history of the creation of the child's body, one can with difficulty refrain from the question, how much they contribute to the theogony (divine generation) of the child's spirit? If we must think of a dark problem it is also permitted, nay necessary, for us to think of some solution. The mental dissimilarity of dispositions is a mere product of bodily differences, since both mutually presuppose each other. It is, indeed, easier for us to apprehend difference in bodies than in minds; but properly, there is only an apparent difference of quantity visible in those, and only a real one of quality in these; so, it is only minds which grow or inure themselves to anything. If it will not be admitted that that spark of distinguishing individuality flies down from the stars in clouds during conception, it must then, either, precisely in the moment of inducting its human covering, cast off a previous covering spun from the father's or the mother's life, or it was, like thought and motion, born of soul. Creation of spirits is not more difficult to comprehend than creation of thoughts by spirits, or than any other change. In both cases, especially in the second, not only does the bodily life of the parents cradle the bodies of the future, but also their spiritual life its spirits. But, then, with what trembling should this balance be held! If thou knewest that every black thought of thine, or every glorious independent one, separated itself from thy soul and took root without thee, and for half a century pushed and bore its poisonous flowers or healing roots, oh! how piously wouldest thou choose and think!—And dost thou, then, so certainly know the reverse?

§ 40.

I come back to my own opinion that spiritual education begins at birth; for up to that period the mother—as often afterwards in a worse sense—has only a blood relationship, not a nerve relationship, with the child sleeping at the gates of the world. So that all that is false which has been said about an electric charging chain to which the little invisible is attached, and by which he is charged with the streams and sparks of the maternal passions and feelings. Since, according to the best anatomists, the mother does not nourish the child with her blood directly, but through media, the maternal passions which are to affect it through the blood can only work in two ways, either by mechanical change, slow or quick, or by chemical change, oxidised or unoxidised. The embryo soul does not partake of the mechanical change; because the mother's blood may move as fast in the ball-room of love as in the servant's hall of anger; or creep as slowly when sitting full of hope before the embroidery frame, as of despair before a bier. The chemical change of the blood by passion, or other external excitement, is itself, in the first instance, a product of the mind and of the nerves which serve it either mediately or immediately. The excitement of the nerves gives the full beat of the pulse, but the converse is not the case; else the excitement of a race would have as strong an effect as a drink has upon thirst. How the oxidised or unoxidised blood of the mother can more affect the child's mind than her own, must arise from the influence of the blood as nourishment; and as the blood, before it is capable of affording nourishment must be assimilated by the little foreign body, it can possess no influence different from that of every other nourishment: and, in nourishing, as little propagates its differences as does the blood of sheep or of lions. The objections made by nurses go far in justification of this.

The best proof of this physiological chain of argument is its superfluity, for experience demonstrates it. For were it true, that the mother had a more spiritual influence on shiftless naked human creatures than that which nourishes them; what a sorry humanity would be sent out into the world from the nine-months' training institute, where on the mother's side all the spiritual and physical defects of female nature are brought together in the nine months and in the time of travail: while on the side of the children the brain and the susceptibility to impressions are greatest, and thereby every fancy of the mother must develop itself in the magnifying glass of the victim, as outward form in the child, and every pain as distortion.

Heaven! if the loathing at food and people, the unnatural longing, the fear, the weepings and the feebleness communicated themselves thus spiritually; so that the mother's womb were the first "foundling hospital" and "deaf-and-dumb" institute for souls, and effeminacy the constitutional sanatorium for men, what a sickly, timid, feeble after-race of progenerated child-bearers. Not a man would then be left—each one would have lived, wept, longed and come to nothing. But this is just as it is not: woman gives men, as the soft cloud gives thunder and hail: the first-born and natural children, by whom the mothers suffer the most, are in fact the strongest: the children of the criminals, the nervous, the consumptive, the mourning widows, or even of the fictitious ones who live for the prospect of divorce, prove themselves just as strong in intellect as the children of other mothers who dance on from joy to joy. If the mother, spiritually copying herself—impressed herself so strongly and spiritually upon the child's soul, I do not know whence originates the distinctive character of children of the same mother: each child must be a mental copier in duplicate of his brothers and sisters and the whole nursery a mental casting-foundry for the mother.

As otherwise concerns the body, that of each child is formed in the very same mother's womb and in an equal period, and with all similarity of condition on the part of the mother—the male twin (to take this case) growing to greater strength and the female to less. He who takes physical abortions for the volcanic outcome of heated fancies on the part of the pregnant mother, forgets that the great Haller denies the whole thing, and adduces the mis-growths of animals and plants in respect to which, to plants especially, heated fancies are little to be regarded: whereunto I add—that amongst 10,000 brooding mothers each one of whom for nine months might have been terrified by an equal number of distorted forms, scarcely one brings into the world anything that is not suited to the world. Tell me not that the beautiful Madonna faces seen in Catholic countries are to be regarded as copies of those painted in the churches; or that the Greeks hung beautiful pictures in the chambers of those blessed, in order to procure living types from them; for I reply, do not all these circumstances indicate antecedently the productions of beautiful lands and beautiful men; and further does not the life-long impression of many forms of beauty recoin with more strength than that of nine months the humanity current in the world?

At the same time, the disbelief that the nine-months' mother decides on the mental and physical form of her child leaves room for the true belief that her health or sickness is repeated in the little second being: and it is for this very reason that superstitious fancies about marks, mis-births and similar things ought to be so much guarded against; not because what is dreaded brings its fulfilment, but because it, along with those evils which are produced by alarm before a thing occurs and undue anxiety after it has happened, weakens the body, and brings for the sufferer years of trouble.

§ 41.

At last the child can say to the father—Educate, for I breathe. The first breath, like the last, closes an old with a new world. The new is, in this case, the world of light and colours—the life on earth, like a painter, begins with the eye. The ear, indeed, preceded it—so that it is the first sense of the living as it is the last of the dying—but then it belonged to the realm of feeling; and it is on this account that birds in the egg, and soft many-punctured silkworms die from a loud report. The first sound falls with a darker chaos on the closely covered soul than the first beam of light. So the morning of life opens on the freed prisoner with the two senses imparting knowledge of distance, like the morning of the day with light and song, or bustle. At the same time, light continues to be the first enamel of the earth, the first fair word of life. The sound which breaks upon the slumbering ear can be but loud, but none near the labouring mother causes it, but her own travail, and the child; and so the world of sound begins with a discord, but the world of sight with beauty and glory.

Every first thing continues for ever with the child; the first colour, the first music, the first flower paint the foreground of his life; yet we can prescribe no other law than this, Protect the child from all that is impetuous and violent, and even from sweet impressions. Nature, so soft, defenceless and excitable, may be distorted by one error, and hardened into a growing deformity. For this reason the crying of children, if composed of a union of discord, hastiness, imperiousness and passion, ought to be guarded against by all due means, but not by effeminacy which only increases it.

§ 42.

If in the ocean of a human soul sections may be made, and degrees of longitude and latitude ascribed to it, we must, in the case of a child, make the first section of the first three years, during which, from the want of the power of speech, he still lives in the animal cloister, and only approaches us through the speech-grating of natural signs. In this speechless period, of which we shall now treat, the pupils are quite given up to feminine fluency; but how women ought now to educate can only be seen later on, when we inquire how they themselves ought to have been educated. In this period of twilight, in this first moon's quarter, or eighth of life, let the light only grow of itself, do not kindle it. Here the sexes are unseparated, neither divided by the Platonic Aristophanes, nor by the tailor. The whole human being is as yet a closed bud whose blossom is concealed. Like the eggs of birds, whether of song or of prey, and like the new-born young of the dove or of the vulture, all at first require warmth, not nourishment, which might have a very different effect.

And what, then, is warmth for the human chicken?—Happiness. One has but to give them play room, by taking away what may be painful, and their powers shoot up of themselves. The new world which the suckling brings with him, and the new one which he finds around him, enfold him as learning, or develop themselves as knowledge; and neither world yet requires the ploughing or sowing of stranger hands. Even the artificial gymnastics of the senses, which will teach a year-old child to see and hear and hold, are not much more necessary than the leading strings which show him how to walk; and can the advantage of teaching some use of the senses, say in three months, which would have come of itself in four, be a recompense for neglecting and wearying oneself in the first year and with the first child, to the injury of after years and the next children, about something which unconstrained life necessitates in savages and country people?

The excellent Schwarz, in his Treatise on Education, prompts, by his proposition of an early gymnasium for all the senses, to an appendix to this paragraph. As to the material advantage of these school classes for the five senses, it is certain that rich varied life, by its unceasing influence, educates and practises the senses with a power which does not require the poverty of particular institutions for practice, except you wish to convert the whole child into one single sense—into a painter's eye, or a musician's ear.

On the other hand, these practices have a formal utility in constraining the mind to perceive the finer subdivisions of its sensations, and to measure the world more accurately by lines than by yards. In the mean time, the inner world offers itself to a finer and higher school than the outward. Especially leave out all exercises of the sense of taste, for whose haut goût the kitchen is the best school; since we do not need by its means to distinguish between nourishment and poison, but rather teach by its exercise at rich tables to confound the two, so that we, unlike the beasts who only when young, from unpractised taste, crop injurious weeds, when old, from refined taste, long for poison-dishes, and poison-goblets.

Let there be here not so much a di-gression as a pre-gression concerning the order of development of the senses. Schwarz, in his Treatise on Education, assigns too late a birth-time, almost beyond the age of childhood, for the senses of taste and smell. He seems, however, to confound the refinement of these senses, which, no doubt, takes place in mature age, with their existence and power, which certainly flourish in their greatest strength during childhood. Every one may remember how as a child, like the animals (which remain stationary on this first step) and like savages, he imbibed every thing tasty, fruits, sugar, sweet wine, fat, with a delight and enjoyment which weakened with every year of the subsequent refinement of the sense; hence the so much lamented love of sweetmeats in all children; hence the experience of so many grown-up people, who have had the favourite dishes of their childhood cooked for them, that they did not like them. Infants, no doubt, take bitter medicines without resistance; but this is no reproach to their taste; we ourselves in later life seek a pure bitter as a higher excitement, in bitter beer, water, and almonds. If a young animal eat poisonous plants which an old one avoids, there is proved by this less want of taste than superabundance of appetite, that is hunger; which, in it, as easily conquers instinct as, in us, it unfortunately overcomes reason.

Smell, the dulness of which sense speaks as little in favour of mental delicacy as that of the eye or of the ear does against it,* awakes with consciousness, consequently, last in a child. We are less aware of its advent because it subserves few necessities; and because its continuance, either, for instance, in spice islands, or in Augean-stable-like streets, renders the consciousness of it difficult. Children have little scent-glands for the persons nearest them, for instance, for their parents; and thereby distinguish them from individuals more rarely seen. And it is precisely smell which dies away the first of all the senses; although it, unlike the other senses, is seldom worn out by too powerful stimulants. And who is there who has not experienced in himself what I have done—that often a nosegay of wild flowers, which was to us, as village children, a grove of pleasure, has, in after years of manhood and in the town, given us by its old perfume an indescribable transport back into god-like childhood; and how, like a flower-goddess, it has raised us into the first embracing Aurora-clouds of our first dim feelings? But how could such a remembrance so strongly affect us if our childish sensibility to flowers had not been strong and heartfelt? Ascribe, then, to after life nothing more than the refinement of a deeply implanted feeling.

* Haller with his weak eyes: Pope and Swift with unmusical ears.

CHAPTER II.

THE JOYOUSNESS OF CHILDREN.

§ 43.

SHOULD they have any thing else? I can endure a melancholy man, but not a melancholy child; the former, in whatever slough he may sink, can yet raise his eyes either to the kingdom of reason or of hope; but the little child is entirely absorbed and weighed down by one black poison-drop of the present. Think of a child led to a scaffold; think of Cupid in a Dutch coffin; or watch a butterfly, after its four wings have been torn off, creeping like a worm, and you will feel what I mean.

But wherefore? The first cause has been already given; the child, like the beast, only knows purest (though shortest) sorrow; one which has no past and no future; one such as the sick man receives from without, the dreamer from himself into his asthenic brain; finally, one with the consciousness not of guilt but of innocence. Certainly all the sorrows of children are but shortest nights, as their joys are but hottest days; and, indeed, both so much so that in the later, often clouded and starless, time of life, the matured man only longingly remembers his old childhood's pleasures, while he seems altogether to have forgotten his childhood's griefs. This weak remembrance is strangely contrasted with the opposing one in dreams and fevers in this respect, that in the two last it is always the cruel sorrows of childhood which return: the dream, this mock-sun of childhood—and the fever, its distorting glass,—both draw forth from dark corners the fears of defenceless childhood, which press and cut with iron fangs into the prostrate soul. The fair scenes of dreams mostly play on an after stage; whereas the frightful ones choose for theirs the cradle and the nursery. Moreover, in fever the ice hands of the fear of ghosts, the striking ones of teachers and parents, and every claw with which fate has pressed the young heart, stretch themselves out to catch the wandering man. Parents! consider, then, that every childhood's Rupert,* even though it has lain chained for tens of years, yet breaks loose and gains mastery over the man as soon as it finds him on a sick bed. The first fright is the more dangerous the sooner it happens; as the man grows older he is less and less easily frightened; the little cradle or bed canopy of the child is more easily quite darkened than the starry heaven of the man.

§ 44.

Cheerfulness, or joyousness, is the heaven under which every thing but poison thrives. But let it not be confounded with enjoyments. Every enjoyment, even the refined one of a work of art, gives man a selfish mien, and withdraws him from sympathy; hence it is only a condition of necessity, not of virtue. On the contrary, cheerfulness, the opposite of vexation and sadness, is at once the ground and flower of virtue and its crown. Animals can enjoy, but only men can be cheerful. The holy father is at the same time called the blessed, and God is the all blessed. A morose God is a contradiction, or the devil. The stoic philosopher must unite scorn of enjoyment with the preservation of cheerfulness. The Christian heaven promises no pleasures, like the Turkish, but the clear, pure, infinite ether of heavenly joy, which flows from the contemplation of the Eternal. The foretaste of heaven—Paradise, to which the theologians denied pleasures, but not cheerfulness—sheltered innocence. The cheerful man wins our eye and heart, as the morose man drives both away: it is the contrary with pleasures, we turn our back on the luxurious, and open our hearts to the starving. If pleasure be a self-consuming rocket, cheerfulness is a returning light star, an object which, unlike pleasure, is not worn away by continuance, but receives from it new birth.

* The name given in Germany to the fictitious being employed to frighten children into obedience.—Tr.

§ 45.

Now let us return to the dear children. I do indeed think, that they ought to inhabit their Paradise like our first parents, those true first children. But pleasures make no Paradise, they only help to laugh it away. Play, that is activity, not pleasures, will keep children cheerful. By pleasure I understand every first agreeable impression, not only of the taste, but also of the ear and the eye: a plaything gives in the first place pleasure by looking at it, and only afterwards cheerfulness by using it. Pleasure is an irritating burning spot, not an all-embracing warmth, on the excitable skin of the child. Further, if refined, perpetual drunkards and epicures multiply and extend their pleasures by the past and the future; so children, from want of both, can only have shortest but, consequently, deepest pleasures. Their point of sight, like their eye, is less than ours; the burning-glass of pleasure should not strike them at focal distance, but far off and gently. In other words, divide the great pleasure into little merry-makings, a gingerbread cake into gingerbread nuts, a Christmas eve into a church year. In one month of nine-and-twenty days a child might be mentally destroyed, if one could make out of every day a first Christmas Day. Not even a grown-up head could stand being crowned every day by a new country: the first in Paris, the second in London, the third in Rome, the fourth in Vienna. But little enjoyments work like scent bottles on the young souls, and strengthen them from action to action.

Nevertheless, this ramification of pleasures only serves for their earliest years: afterwards, in a reversed way, will a Midsummer-feast, a grape-gathering, a Shrove-tide, for which children have long to wait, together with the gleanings of a lively memory, shine all the more brightly in the dull interval.

A word about children's love of sweetmeats, against which Schwarz strives perhaps too eagerly, may be dropped here. I never yet knew a child to whom sweet savory things and pastry did not seem the most inimitable cakes and altar paintings, and this merely because a child, half animal, half savage, is all taste. Bees have at the same time a honey and a wax stomach; but among human beings, children have the first, grown people the second. If Schwarz has always found love of eating and want of modesty united, he can only declare this of the age of manhood; but even then the love of eating was only the consequence and companion of deeper sensual pleasures, not their cause. Certainly, the unbridled sensualist will alter in his meats, and also in his tastes, as the lover of eating does on other grounds; but, on the other hand, how can the pleasures of taste, which grow weaker as every year is further from childhood, end in still lower sensualities, especially since the generality of souls, in regard to love, resemble the Egyptians, among whom the gods reigned earlier than mortal men? The fathers do not hop, but the children do; then leave them their other Egyptian flesh-pots before their journeying forth into the desert. The author has often made the sugar-island of the tongue, on which of itself no Paphian wood grows, into a kind of palæstra of self-denial; at the same time he relates the matter with diffidence, only as a question, not an answer. For instance, he gave to the two- and three-year old children candied marchpane (the most wholesome thing) with the command only to suck it at a certain place, and only for so long a time as he permitted. The children learned to value and to keep a promise. He also offered sugar or honey prizes for the endurance of the most strokes on the hand; but he did it seldom.

Most royal children can shorten our inquiries by their decision. For, as regards pleasures, they have everything from toys and drinking- and eating-things to carriage seats and bed cushions; but, as far as happiness is concerned, they are tormented from their governors up through every member of their court; so that the kingly crown is very early underlined with a crown of thorns, or, to speak differently, the black round of sorrow is made broader in proportion to their high rank. For, indeed, when we consider how generally a prince, satiated with eating and drinking, is so educated that he cannot make a step without tutors and lectures, nor a skip without the dancing-master, nor take a breath of fresh air without four horses, we must almost believe that the ancient heretic Basilides is now again right as regards princes, when he declared that the early Christians would often have been martyrs for future sins, if the after-pains were not added to the fore-pains of the future.

Cheerfulness—this feeling of an entirely free nature and life, this self enjoyment of the inner world, not of an outward minute part of the world—opens the child to the penetrating All; it receives nature, not loveless and defenceless, but loving and armed, and lets all the young powers rise like morning beams, and play upon the world and upon itself; and it imparts, as moroseness takes away, strength. The early blossoms of gladness are not corn-flowers among the seed, but are themselves little young ears of corn. It is a beautiful tradition that the Virgin Mary and the poet Tasso never wept as children.*

But now the question is of the means and starry influences which preserve this cheerfulness. If it merely resulted from negative and physical conditions, then, at least for the most instructive half year of life, that is the first, all would be obtained by a child who was born in spring. Why do not men begin life, as Oriental nations do the year, with spring? A child born at this season, might an almanac say without lying, moves slowly on from charm to charm, from leaves to flowers, from the warmth of rooms to that of the sky: the wind is not yet his enemy—instead of storms, melodies breathe in the branches—born to a half year's festival of the earth, he must believe that life remains so—he sees the rich earth only afterwards hidden by its covering—and the enjoyment of life which the suckling mother imbibes flows warm through the little heart.

* Pertschen's Church History.

CHAPTER III.

GAMES OF CHILDREN.

§ 46.

THAT which produces and maintains cheerfulness is nothing but activity. The usual games of children, unlike ours, are only the expressions of earnest activity, clothed in lightest wings: children have also a game (it is one to them) I mean that of joking, of unmeaning speech, in order to have something to say to themselves, and so forth. Now if a German were to write a book about the games of children, which would at least be more useful than one about games of cards, he would, it seems to me, distinctly and correctly divide them only into two classes: first, into games or exertions of the receiving, apprehending, learning faculties; and, secondly, into games of the acting, forming powers. The first class would embrace activity from without working inwardly, like the nerves of sense; the other activity from within working outwardly, like the nerves of motion. Consequently, if the author went deeply into the first class, which he calls the theoretic,—the second, on the other hand, the practical,—he would adduce games which are properly only a child's experimental physics, optics, mechanics. Children have great pleasure for instance, in turning or raising anything—putting keys into locks and, in general, one thing into another—opening and shutting doors, to which is added, moreover, the dramatic fancy of seeing the room now large now small, and themselves alone one moment, in company the next;—watching the employment of their parents is to them a game of this kind, as is also listening to conversation.

In the second or practical division, the author must put all those games in which the child seeks to relieve himself of his mental superabundant activity by dramatic fancies, and of his bodily, by movements. The examples will come in the next paragraph.

But I think so very scientific a man would form a third class, already hinted at; namely, that in which the child only plays the game, does not really act and feel it, that is, where he takes and gives a comfortable form and tone; for instance, looks out of the window, lies upon the grass, listens to the nurse and other children.

§ 47.

Play is, in the first place, the working off at once of the overflow of both mental and physical powers; afterwards, when the school sceptre has carried off the mental source of all fire, even till rain comes, the limbs only throw off the fulness of life by running, throwing, carrying. Play is the first poetry of the human being. (Eating and drinking are his prose; and striving to get the needful supplies his first solid bread-study and labour of life.) Consequently play forms all the powers, without imparting an overweening influence to any one.* If a teacher would be cruel enough to form a whole man into one member, for instance, into a magnified ear, he must during the first years so mix the playing cards, by abstracting some, that nothing could ever be obtained but games of sound. If he wished to be anything better in the games than cruel, he would perhaps endeavour to lead his pupil with gentle hand, imitating chance which acts from all sides and develops all. But I dread that grown-up hairy hand and fist which knocks on the tender fructifying dust of childhood's blossoms and shakes a colour off, first here, then there, so that the proper many marked carnation may be formed. We often think to rule the external but broad empire of chance by means which some inner narrow accident has thrown together in ourselves.

* Many children's games are imitations (but mental, whereas those of monkeys are physical), that is to say, not from any especial interest in the thing, but merely because imitation falls in most readily with the mental impulses of life. Probably the monkey, like Dr. Monro's nervous patient, only imitates strange movements, compulsorily and from weakness.

§ 48.

We will, however, step further into the play-place of the little folks, if not to be lawgivers, yet to be markers of their games. During the first months of existence the child knows nothing of creative play or efforts, only of the passive reception of impressions. During that period of the most rapid physical growth and inpouring of the world of sense, the overwhelmed soul does not direct itself towards those active games in which afterwards its superabundant powers find relief. It can only look, listen, catch, touch: so laden, its little hands and arms quite full, it can do and attempt little with them.

It is only at a later period, when, by means of the five acts of the five senses, the knowledge of the outer world is attained, and one word after another gradually liberates the mind, that greater freedom produces active play; and that fancy begins to move, whose unfledged wings language first plumes. Only by words does the child obtain an inner world opposed to the outer, by which he can set the external universe in motion. He has two kinds of play very different both in direction and time—first, that with playthings; and second, that with and among playmates.

§ 49.

In the first place the child plays with things, consequently with himself. A doll is to him a nation, or a company of players, and he is the theatrical poet and director. Every bit of wood is a gilded flower rod, on which fancy can bud hundred-leaved roses. For not merely to grown-up people, but also to children, the plaything itself becomes indifferent if a happy imagination alone be permitted to decide; whether it be with regard to imperial or laurel crowns, shepherds' crooks, or marshals' staves, the flails of war or of agriculture. In the eyes of wonder-working fancy every Aaron's rod blossoms. As the Elysian fields of the ancients near Naples were grounded (according to Maccard) on nothing more than a bush in a cave, so, for children, is every bush a forest; and they possess that heaven which Luther in his table-talk promises the saints, where the bugs are sweet-scented, the serpents playful, the dogs gold-skinned, and Luther a lamb. I mean to say, that in the heaven of childhood the father is God the Father, the mother the Mother of God, the nurse a Titaness, the old servant an Angel of the Communion, the turkey a Cherub of Eden, and Eden itself is restored. Do you not know that there is a time when fancy is more actively creative than even in youth, namely, in childhood, in which nations create their gods, and only speak in poetry?

Never forget that the games of children with inanimate playthings are so important, because for them there are only living things: (a doll is as much a human being to a child as a baby is to a woman;) and also because to them every word is a reality. In beasts the body alone plays, in children the mind. Life meets them on every side; they cannot comprehend death, or any thing dead; and therefore the happy beings, animating every thing, surround themselves only with life, and hence it is they say, for instance, "The lights have covered themselves up and gone to bed—the spring has dressed itself—the water runs down the glass—his house lives there—the wind dances,"* —or of a watch from which the works are removed, "It is not alive."

But among richer realities fancy fades and grows poor; in the mean time every plaything and playworld is only a distaff of flax from which the soul spins a many-coloured coat. As the rook in chess was among different people, now a camel, now an elephant, a stork, a boat, a castle; so among children, one plaything often acts many parts, and every time it seems to them, as manna did to the Jews, the very thing they desired. The author remembers a little girl of two years old who, after having long carried about an old doll reduced to the bare wood, had at last placed in her arms a very pretty and skilfully dressed one—a foster-sister of the most beautiful in Bertuch's Journal des Modes, which it resembled as much in optic beauty as it surpassed it in size. Soon afterwards the child not only resumed her former conduct towards the wooden sloven, but went so far as to take into her arms, in the place of child or doll, a shabby boot-jack of her father's, which she nursed and rocked to sleep as lovingly as the above-mentioned original of Bertuch's pictures. So much more readily does fancy invest an invisible Adam's rib with human limbs and fashionable costume than a doll which only differs in size from a lady, and which, on its side, appears to the imagination at the next tea-party so perfect that it can be improved in nothing. Just so the same little lassie, sitting beside the author, wrote for a long time with a pen dipped only in air on an ever-white sheet of paper, until he almost fancied it was a satire on himself. Consequently do not surround your children, like princes' children, with a little world of the turner's: do not give them eggs coloured and painted over with figures, but white; they will soon from their own minds hatch the coloured feathers. On the contrary, the older a man grows the more rich a reality should appear: the heath on which the youth gleaned at least the morning-dew of the light of love, grows cold with the dark night-dew to the half-blind old man, and at last man requires a whole world, I mean the next, in order only to live.

* Some girl in terror at the raging of the wind substituted "dance" euphemistically.

§ 50.

But by the same fancy which, like the sun, paints the colours on the leaves are they also again removed from them. The same mistress of the robes dresses, and also undresses; consequently there is for children no ever-enduring play or plaything. Therefore do not let a plaything which has lost its charm lie long before the eye conscious of the change; lay it by. After a long time the dismissed favourite will be received with honour. The same is to be said of picture-books; for a poetic animation is as necessary to the picture-book as to the play drawer. A few words about that. The proper picture-books for A B C children do not consist of a sequence of unknown plants and animals, whose differences only the instructed eye perceives, but of historical pieces which present the actions of animals or men taken from the child's circle.

Then this living gallery, in whose universal history the child can more clearly paint the individual-being than the reader or author can in the all-embracing generality of poetry, may be exalted into historic groups; for instance into a Joseph among his brethren, selling or recognising him,—into a Hector's farewell of wife and child, and such like subjects.

Children—those of one or two years old excepted who still need the spur of colour—only require drawings, not paintings; colours resemble the above-mentioned luxuriousness of playthings and, by reality, weaken the creative faculty. Therefore give no plaything whose end is only to be looked at; but let every one be such as to lead to work. For instance, a little complete mine, after being a few hours before the child's eyes, is altogether gone over and each tiny vein of ore exhausted; but a box of building materials, a collection of detached houses, bridges and trees, by their ever-varying location, will make him as rich and happy as an heir to the throne, who makes his mental dispositions known by rebuilding his father's palace in the park. Moreover, small pictures are better than large ones. What is to us almost invisible is to children only little; they are physically short sighted, consequently suited to what is near; and with their short yard, that is, with their little body, they so easily find giants everywhere, that to these little juveniles we should present the world on a reduced scale.

§ 51.

Before the new philosophers, who in education more readily give everything than something, one grows so very much ashamed of such a paragraph as this that one scarcely knows how to deck and sweeten it. I must, however, say that for children in their early years, I know no cheaper and more lasting plaything, one that is also clean and suited for both sexes, than what everyone has in the pineal-gland, some in the bladder, and birds in the stomach—sand. I have seen children weary of play use it for hours as building material, as hurling machine, as a cascade, water for washing, seed, flour, finger-tickler, as inlaid work, and raised work, as a ground for writing and paintings. It is to boys what water is to girls. Philosophers! strew sand less in than before the eyes in the birdcage of your children. Only one thing has to be cared for with regard to it, that they do not eat their plaything.

§ 52.

The second kind of play is the playing of children with children. If men be made for men, so are children for children, only much more beautifully. In their early years children are to one another only the completion of their fancy about one plaything: two fancies, like two flames, play near and in one another, yet un-united. Moreover children alone are sufficiently childlike for children. But in later years the first little bond of society is woven of flower-garlands; playing children are little European savages in social contract for the performance of one drama. On the play-place they first issue from the speaking and audience hall into the true sphere of action, and begin their human praxis. For parents and teachers are ever to them those strange heaven-descended gods, who, according to the belief of many nations, appeared teaching and helping the new men on the new-born earth: at least they are to the child gigantic Titans;—consequently in this theocracy and monarchy free resistance is forbidden and injurious to them, obedience and faith serviceable and salutary. Where then can the child show and mature his governing power, his resistance, his forgiveness, his generosity, his gentleness, in short every root and blossom of society, except in freedom among his equals? Teach children by children! The entrance into their play-room is for them an entrance into the great world; and their mental school of industry is in the child's play-room and nursery. It is often of more use to a boy himself to administer the cane than to receive it from his tutor; and still more to have it inflicted by one of his equals than by one of his superiors. If you wish to form a slave for life, fasten a boy for fifteen years to the legs and arms of his tutor, who is to be at once theatrical director, and occasional member of the twopersoned company. Like all slaves, the child will probably keep his eye and heart armed against his tyrant's individuality; but, accustomed to one climate and sailing only with one wind, he will be unable in future to withstand the all-sidedness of individualities.

§ 53.

The teaching and feeding master of the little one always acts as if the proper life of the child, as a human being, were not actually begun, but waited until he himself had departed in order then to lay the key-stone of the arch. Even the travelling tutor believes that, so long as he walks beside and sows seed in the furrow, the time of leaves and flowers has not arrived. For man, needing an external whole, when once an inner one animates him, fixes that outer one, like the arch of the sky and the approach of heaven to earth, in the distance and on the horizon, although from every hill which he successively mounts that heaven flies away into the more distant blue; and so man arrives at old age, and at last, on the mound of the grave, heaven rests upon earth. The whole of life is, then, nowhere or everywhere. Heavens! where a man is, there eternity, not time, begins. Consequently the plays and actions of children are as serious and full of meaning in themselves and in reference to their future, as ours are to ours. The early game becomes the earnest of later years; although children in play often repeat something as the echo of an earlier reality, just as the Neapolitans play cards during theatrical representations. Möser dictated his works while playing ombre: perhaps his have been secretly suggested to many an author by his early childhood's games. As chess is said to serve for instruction in war and government, so the future laurels and tree of knowledge grow in the play-ground. The bishop Alexander considered those children on whom Athanasius when a child playfully bestowed baptism, to have been really baptized. If, as Archenholz relates, the boys of Winchester School once rebelled against their masters, garrisoned the principal entrance to the schoolhouse, and provided themselves so well with arms and munition that the high sheriff of the county, although he marched against them with 150 constables and 80 militia men, was yet obliged to grant an honourable capitulation—I see in this angry play nothing further than the youth of that present (even though it be unjust) manhood, which bars rivers and harbours and their own island, and on the sea conquers countries: so much does the foam of childish play subside into true wine; and their fig leaves conceal not nakedness but sweet figs.

§ 54.

If one were to make propositions, that is wishes, one might express this: That for every child a circle of games and real actions should be provided, composed of as many different individualities, conditions and years as can possibly be found, in order to prepare him, in the orbis pictus of a diminished play-world, for the larger real one. But to give the social account of these three play provinces would require a book within the book.

Moreover, I would propose pleasure and playmasters, as the precursors and leaders of the schoolmaster—and also play-rooms, empty as those rooms on whose plaster walls Raphael's immortal flowers bloom—and also play gardens. And I am just reading that Grabner, in his travelling description of the Netherlands, gives an account of play-schools, to which the Dutchman sends his children sooner than to the schools of instruction. Certainly if one of the two must fall, it were better the former should continue in existence.

Yet a few miscellaneous observations. Children love no plays so much as those in which they have something to expect, or to dread: so early does the poet, with his knot making and loosing, play his part in man. From time to time they, like deep, unlucky players, ask for new cards. But this changeableness is not merely that of luxury, but also the consequence of their rapid growth—for the so quickly ripening child seeks new fruits in new countries, as the aged seeks new ones in the old. Perhaps also it is the consequence of that want of a future and a past, whereby a child is so much more strongly affected and wearied by the present, as though he were seated in a world of sunbeams without morning and evening redness: and, lastly, for the child, to whose littleness not only space * but time is magnified, play hours must grow into play years; and therefore we must indulge him, the short-sighted being, in his desire of change and new games. The one-houred constancy of a child equals, nay surpasses, that of one month in his parents.

The Jews forbid to celebrate two festivals on the same day, a marriage, for instance, on a feast day, or two marriages at the same time. Should not children be refused in a similar manner if, after having taken a walk on a summer evening, they beg leave to play in the garden, and then, thirdly, to bring their playfellows into the parlour for a quarter of an hour before supper? For herein are children antedated grown-up persons; and, while at work, scarcely long so much for pleasure, as for what comes after pleasure; from one sugar-island they would at once sail over to another, and heap heaven upon heaven. If this frequentativum of the enjoyment of even innocent pleasures be allowed, the child, dearest mother, becomes only fitted for a court, or royal residence, and lays claim to pleasure as a right—months of thirty-two days, and feast-days of twenty-five hours, each of which measures full sixty-one minutes. And so the little being is already dipped in the honey of present superabundant pleasure, whereby time clogs the butterfly wings of the Psyche for every flight. The only good (if, indeed, it be any) that can come out of a girl thus educated, is at most a woman who, on the same day, after having received and paid some visits, amuses herself at the theatre, and then afterwards hopes for cards and dancing.

As nature by cool refreshing night breaks off the culminating pleasures of our constitution, always requiring stronger excitement; so this healthy night-coolness should be given, in a mental sense, to children, in order not to expose them in the future to the sufferings of the people of the world and of pleasure; who, like sea-farers in northern latitudes, wearied by month-long unceasing day, pray and bless God for a little night and candle-light.

* It is a familiar experience that when one lights as a man on objects of childhood all seem smaller and shorter; for the measure, not the things, has grown longer.

But let there ever be, if many games, yet few playthings—and not apparent—and every evening put away into one place—and for twins let the same piece be doubled, as for three children trebled, in order to avoid quarrels.*

The early games should assist the mental development, for the physical advances gigantically without help: later ones should draw the physical up along with the mental, which, by schools and advancing years, takes the precedence. Let the child toy, sing, look, listen; but let the boy and the girl run, climb, throw, build, bear heat and cold.

The most delightful and inexhaustible play is speaking; first of the child with itself, and still more of the parents with it. In play and for pleasure you cannot speak too much with children; nor in punishing, or teaching them, too little.

Immediately after waking, the child, owing to his mental and physical excitability, requires almost nothing, still less you; shortly before going to sleep, as at the burning out of a bonfire, a little weariness is serviceable. For older children, whom labour exercises and controls, its end (freedom) is itself a game; and then the open air. The open air—an expression which Europe, like death, must soon exchange for the more correct one—the open æther. But let not the teacher after the work also order and regulate the games! It is decidedly better not to recognise or make any order in games—not even mine—than to keep it up with difficulty and send the zephyrets of pleasure through artistic bellows and air-pumps to the little flowers. Animals and savages never experience tedium, neither would children if we were not so very anxious to keep it away. Let the child experience in play his future life; and since from that the mountain and storm pressure of tedium cannot be removed, let the child sometimes feel it, in order afterwards not to perish under its weight.

* Here a sensible friend makes the important objection that by this means children are deprived of the pleasure of giving and receiving. He would recommend instead a different toy for each for the pleasure of exchanging.

CHAPTER IV.

CHILDREN'S DANCES.

§ 55.

I know not whether I should most deprecate children's balls, or most praise children's dances! The former—before the dancing-master—in the society of lookers-on and fellow dancers—in the hot temperature of the ball-room, and among its hot products—are, in the highest degree, the front ranks and leading steps to the dance of death. On the contrary, children's dances are what I will now commend more at large.

As the first speech long precedes grammar, so should dancing precede and prepare the way for the art of dancing. A father who has an old piano, or fiddle, or flute, or an improvising singing voice, should call his own and neighbour's children together, and let them every day for an hour hop and turn by his orchestra, in pairs, in rows, in circles, very frequently alone, accompanying themselves with singing, as their own grinding organ; and also in any way they like. In the child happiness dances; in the man, at most, it only smiles or weeps. The mature man can in dancing only express the beauty of the art, not himself and his emotions: love would thereby comport itself too rudely, joy too loudly and boldly, before the stern Nemesis. In the child, body and soul still live united in their honeymoon, and the active body dances after the happy soul; until afterwards both separate from bed and board, and at last entirely leave one another. In later times the light zephyr of contentment cannot turn the heavy metal standard to point its course.

§ 56.

Children are like Forrer's watches which wind themselves up if you walk about with them. As in the old astronomy, eleven of their heavens are moveable, and only one, that of sleep, stationary. It is only dancing in a circle that is light enough for a child; only for youth is a straight course not too difficult. As to the heavenly bodies, so to children, do the motion and music of the spheres belong; whereas the older body, like water, takes the straight path. To speak more plainly: Women, it is well known, cannot run, but only dance; and every one would more easily reach by dancing than by walking a posthouse, to which, instead of a straight poplar alley, a lordly row of trees planted in the English fashion, conducted. Now children are diminutive women—at least boys are, although girls are often only diminutive boys. Dancing is the easiest of all movements, because it needs the least space and is the most varied; hence joy is not a runner but a dancer: hence the indolent savage dances, and the wearied negro slave rouses himself by dancing to fresh exertion: hence the runner—all other circumstances being the same—has more frequently fallen down dead than the dancer. Hence camels, and armies, and Oriental labourers continue their laborious marches for a longer time and with more ease to the sound of music; not principally because music produces cheerfulness, that might easily be attained by other pleasures, but because music rounds off the straight movement into the circling dance and its still returning rhythm; for it is only in a circular, not in a straight line, that every thing returns in thirds. As an argumentative or a narrative sequence (science or history) prepares us by every effort of attention for a still stronger, whereas the zigzag of the epigram each moment compels us to a new beginning and fresh exertion; so physically the same is the case in running and walking, in which, up-hill, or down-hill, no effort is cause of its successor, but the great follows the little, or the strongest the strongest, as the case may be: in dancing, on the contrary, without aim or compulsion, one movement constantly springs out of the other and renders cessation, rather than continuance, difficult. All running, but no dancing, desires an end. What better movement, then, can there be for children than this revolving one? The gymnastic of running, going on stilts, climbing, &c., steels and hardens individual forces and muscles, whereas dancing, on the contrary, like a physical poet exercises and equalises all the muscles.

§ 57.

Further, the harmony connected with it imparts to the affections and the mind that metrical order which reveals the highest, and regulates the beat of the pulse, the step and even the thoughts. Music is the metre of this poetic movement, and is an invisible dance, as dancing is a silent music. Finally, this also ranks among the advantages of this eye and heel pleasure; that children with children, by no harder canon than the musical, light as sound, may be joined in a rose-bud feast without thorns or strife.

In short, dancing cannot come soon enough, "but the dancing-master may more easily come too soon than too late." This last part appears in the first edition. I should, perhaps, more correctly have written singing than dancing-master, because those skilled in the art declare that the early exercise of the voice is injurious to it. The first edition is only right in so far as it may to the utmost remove children, brought up in genteel coquetry, from the influence of the dancing-master, who would reduce all bodily movements to rule and system. On the other side, again, the second edition is right, if it add that better-educated children, who in their eighth and ninth years, instead of vanity, know only the law of the good and the beautiful, may join with less danger to their higher self the trivial regiment and ruling fiddle of the dancing-master in their early years when they can learn to dance, as to walk and to read, without coquetry. Then also the dancing-hour may become an hour of freedom and play to those poor persecuted children who are treated like goats, whose sinews are cut to prevent them from jumping.

CHAPTER V.

MUSIC.

§ 58.

MUSIC, the only fine art in which man and all classes of animals—spiders, mice, elephants, fish, amphibious creatures, birds—have a community of goods, must ceaselessly affect the child, who is the spiritual man and the brute beast united. And so one might break the heart of the little new possessor of life with a trumpet, and its ear with shrieks and discord. Therefore, it is probable that the first music, perhaps as an undying echo in the child, forms the secret thorough-bass, the melodious theme in the brain-chambers of a future master of sound, which his after compositions only harmoniously vary.

Music, rather than poetry, should be called "the happy art." She imparts to children nothing but heaven, for as yet they have not lost it, and lay no memories as mufflers on the clear sounds. Choose melting melodies, and soft strains; even with those you only excite the child to frisk and dance about. Savages, powerful and pleasure-loving people, such as Greeks, Russians and Neapolitans, have their popular songs set entirely in minor keys. For some years the child, like the father, can weep at certain sounds; but in him it arises from overflowing happiness, for as yet the memory does not place beneath those tuneful hopes the reckoning of its losses.

§ 59.

Yet among all the instruments which sound in Haydn's child's concerts, that best serves the purposes of educational music which is born with the performer—the voice. In the childhood of nations speaking was singing. Let this be repeated in the childhood of the individual. In singing, the human being, harmony and heart coalesce at the same time in one breast—whereas instruments seem only to lend him a voice:—with what arms can a parent more closely and more gently draw the little beings towards him than with his spiritual ones, with the tones of his own heart, with the same voice which always speaks to them, but now transfigured into a musical ascension?

Thereby they have the advantage and the consciousness that they can imitate it on the spot. Singing takes the place of screaming, which the doctors so much praise as a palæstra for the lungs, and first military exercise of speech. Is there anything more beautiful than a merry singing child? And how unweariedly he repeats the same thing, which is so repulsive to the little soul in all other games! As in maturer age the Alpine shepherd and the chained labourer sing away their vacancy and long hours of compulsory sitting; so the child sings away childhood, and sings on, hearing only himself. For harmony, like the innate poetry of the feelings, says nothing but the same thing, unsatiated by repetition, unwearied by sound.

Let the father, like the Frieslander, follow the proverb—Frisia non cantat—and never or seldom sing: I would wish him to do it for his children, and the mother for him and them.

§ 60.

As one drops asleep by inward listening to singing, so one might, at least in a case where immediate waking is necessary (always a most undesirable thing) effect it by music, as Montaigne's father did. A flute-playing clock would be a good awakener. And why should not harmony be employed as a soul-curative means against the maladies of children, against vexation, obstinacy, anger?

CHAPTER VI.

COMMANDS, PROHIBITIONS, PUNISHMENTS, AND CRYING.

§ 61.

ROUSSEAU could not write these paragraphs; for he was of a different opinion. But I agree with Basedow, and do not believe, with the former, that the parental will can and ought to assume the appearance of a mere accident. Rewarding and punishing merely by physical consequences and regulations, and in fact the whole of Rousseau's system of education, would throw away a grown-up man for the sake of a growing one: but life is not given to pass merely from education again to education. Rousseau himself admits that only an approach to his plan is possible ; but then one is just as far as ever from the goal ; since here it does not depend on the failure of a degree, but of a species. Fortunately this erroneous course is closed against the child's mind.

How, then, would the child attain the after-feeling of necessity without the fore-feeling of freedom which he must see as strong in others, or in his equals, as in himself? Much more must the child—proceeding from himself—regard all things, even dead matter, as free, and be exasperated with every opposition, as though it were intentional. The deeper the chain of souls hangs down the broader does the free ocean flow around. The dog bites the stone—the child strikes both—the savage sees in the storm a war kindled and led by spirits. It is only to the clearer eye that that dark iron mass which we call necessity stands in the midst of the universe like a black sun. Even this it is that first draws the free spirit, which begins and ends in freedom, out of understanding into reason, out of the finite into infinitude. The child, then, who makes every thing into an independent being, consequently yourself in the first place, finds in every occurrence a premeditated course of action, and in every hindrance an enemy. Do not we older ones experience during our whole life the iron power of nature, yet without resigning ourselves calmly and uncomplainingly to it, when, for instance, it either closes it irremediably, as in death, or embitters it, as in old age? And whence do physical consequences obtain their educational reputation except from the unchangeableness of nature? Now free will may appear to the child just as consequential and immoveable! Then he beholds a higher than blind necessity. Further, is there any necessity which better teaches endurance than the mental one of a foreign will? Finally, how can trust in men—that noble bond of human and higher oneness—come to life in a child without some object, without a parent's word on which he may confide?

§ 62.

The modes, then, of commanding and forbidding are all that come under consideration. And here we must entreat pardon for the disorderly ranks of a merely experimental system of education.

Take no pleasure in ordering to do or not to do, but in the child's free action. In frequent orders the parent's advantage is more considered than the child's.

Let the child be irresistibly bound by your word, but not you yourself: you need not give any edicta perpetua, but your lawgiving power can each day issue new decrees and pastoral letters.

Forbid seldomer by actions than by words: do not snatch the knife out of the child's hands, but let him lay it down himself at your desire; in the first case he obeys the pressure of a foreign power, in the second its guidance.

Let your tables of the law be unbroken, and in raised character. Rather forbid the whole, if it is difficult for you to separate its parts: for instance—touching the table at all, though you may only wish to protect some articles upon it.

Let the child learn in himself the right he demands from others. Consequently let the respect for property be decidedly and unsparingly exacted from him. What belongs to the child? Father and mother, nothing more: every thing else belongs to them. But as every man desires a world, yea, a whole universe, for his patrimony, mete out little to the little ones and say—"No more!"

The child's ear readily distinguishes a decided from an angry tone of voice: the mother easily falls into the latter when she attempts to imitate the father in the former. His commands are better obeyed than hers for three reasons; the first, his decided, though far removed from angry, voice, has been already mentioned. The second is, that the man, for the most part, like the warrior, says only one, and consequently the same, imperial No; whereas women can scarcely say to a child, Be quiet! without colon and semicolon, and most necessary notes of interrogation and exclamation. Was there ever in history an instance of a woman training a dog? Or could a general, in commanding her marching army to halt, ever express herself otherwise than thus: "All you people, as soon as I have done speaking, I command you all to stand still in your places, halt, I tell you!" The third reason is, that the man more rarely withdraws his refusal.

The best rule in politics is said to be "pas trop gouverner:" it is also true in education. But some teachers, in order to be always talking, and rather to resemble ringing silver than dead-sounding gold, preach as often against faults and in favour of virtues which come with years, as against faults and for virtues which increase with age; why, for instance, is there so much precipitate haste about learning to walk, to knit, to read, as if these arts must not finally come of themselves? But quite different things are, for example, pure enunciation, correct writing, and holding the pen and person properly while so engaged, a sense of order, and generally those capabilities which only grow with years. Since, unfortunately, independently of these things, education and instruction require so many words, spare using them against fading faults, and direct them against growing ones. Frugal speech cultivates and strains the powers of the interpreting child, as riddles do. Grown people do the same towards one another: for instance, a great man of my acquaintance says at first, among a circle of strangers, little more than hum, hum, and that very low; but just as (according to the Indian myth) the silent godhead interrupted his eternity and creation began, only because he in a similar way said, "oum"* so this man, merely by his "hum," gives everyone much to think of. Yes, I know even a greater and more useful one-syllableness than even the Chinese: that is no-syllableness, or silence. Young doctors, who do not wish to forget natural philosophy in their usual medical sciences, very often make use of it, in their examinations before the collegium medicum, in reply to very common questions; as Socrates was silent when angry, so they wish by silence to express their indignation at questions about miserable sciences to which they have always remained strangers.

But to return from this digression, which can less be ranked among the improvements than among the additions to the second edition—many of us teachers accompany our commands and prohibitions with moral reasons on their way to the heart, which are mere superficiality, for the child's conscience itself affords their strongest proof: but a sequence of reasons is useful in connection with medicinal, gymnastic, and other commands, which find in the child, instead of an advocate, only curiosity and ignorance.

* Görre's History of Myths.

Further, we grown-up people all have and admit (though without deriving any peculiar benefit from it) the fault of considering every difference of a child from ourselves as a failing, our scoldings as lessons, childish errors as greater than our own; and thence it is we so thoughtlessly convert our educational rein and leading-strings into a hanging rope, and would willingly carve the child into a neat cork Swiss model of our Alps (as Pfyffer does the lofty mountains); and thence it is also, since the like is not easily accomplished, that we talk on and on, like the shell sea trumpet which ceaselessly sounds, and with our school-chalk draw and lengthen the broad stroke before the beak of the poor hen, so that she may always stare down on the same line without being able to look upwards.

Even a grown-up man whom some one should follow all day long with moveable pulpit and stool of confession, from which to hurl sermons and anathemas, could never attain any real activity and moral freedom; how much less then a weak child, who, at every step in life, must be entangled in a "stop—run—be quiet—do that!" It is the same fault as that filling and cramming of the day with mere lessons; under which rain-spout of instruction princely children especially stand, as if to make up by that flow of teaching for the future ebb of learning. And what else, in fact, is this but unceasingly to sow one field full of seed upon seed? A dead corn granary may possibly come out of it, but no living harvest field. Or, in another simile, your watch stops while you wind it up, and you everlastingly wind up children and never let them go.

The reason why children dread the fire, which always burns, more than the knife, which does not always cut, applies to their different kind of fear of father and of mother: he is the fire, she the knife. The difference does not lie in their severity, for an angry mother is severity itself, but in their unchangeableness. The younger the child the more necessary is one-syllableness; yes, even that is not necessary; shake the head and let that be enough. At most say, Pst! Later on, give the reasons in a gentle voice, merely to render obedience easier by the fair tokens of love. For vehement refusal produces in the child vehement demand.

Forbid in a gentle voice, so that a whole gamut of increased force may be open to you, and only once. The last may cost labour. Even in the child that human system of delay rules which for every rapid determination must have time for three words of command and three summonses, together with some hours of grace. Do not, then, be more angry than is fitting, if a child, for instance, closes a forbidden noise with a so finely graduated Allegro ma non troppo and manando, that you yourself at last cannot accurately distinguish resistance from obedience. Here there remains no choice but either punishment for the most infinitely small disobedience, or, after the first obedience, indifference to the rest: the latter seems to me the best. But there is a more beautiful lingering, the parental. The first and quickest word which a father gives to a begging child, or wife, or servant is, No; thereupon he endeavours to grant the request, and says Yes at the end instead of at the beginning. The mother does still worse. Can you, then, obtain from yourself no respite, no interval before decision, for the child, or whoever it may be, by merely answering to every request, "Come again," or "After this," or "In three Saxon minutes of rest"? Women, I would only recommend you this law of delay in order to be less frequently in opposition to others. Another parental delay, that of punishment, is of use for children of the second five years (quinquennium). Parents and teachers would more frequently punish according to the line of exact justice if, after every fault in a child, they would only count four-and-twenty, or their buttons, or their fingers. They would thereby let the deceiving present round themselves, as well as round the children, escape; the cold still empire of clearness would remain behind, and the child, as well as father (supposing, for instance, that anger would else have been the occasion for as well as the medium of (the punishment, or the correction also the repetition of the fault), would learn in the reflected mutual pain to regard that of the other. Beccaria rightly attaches the punishment, or hangman, close to the heels of the criminal, because compassion and oblivion would else only act against, not in favour of the executioner; but the presupposed, wide-extended despotism of the parental law admits of the softening interval of time before the spectators, as well as before the child, and in the rulers themselves. Only with regard to your youngest children attach the punishment to the very fault, like a physical effect to its cause.

§ 63.

After unchangeable biddings and forbiddings, one might also recommend to the parents some wishes, whose fulfilment would depend solely on the love and free choice of the children, in order to exercise them in freedom and love and merit. I will do so.

The obedience of children, in itself alone without consideration of its motive, can have no other value than that thereby much is made easier to the parents. Or would it be good for a soul's growth, suppose your child always submitted, bent and broke his will to that of others as to yours? What a pliable, dislocated human member, bound on the wheel of fortune, would the child then be! But what you desire is, not his obedience, but his inclination to it, love, trust, self-denial, the grateful reverence for the best (namely his parents)! And in so far you are right. But therefore take care to command nothing to which the higher motive does not itself call and incline you. To forbid will less irritate and less cause to err a child who regards everything as the independent property of his parents, than to command; since the young spirit already knows that he has at least one property, himself and justice. Mothers willingly call to the help of their biddings and forbiddings the dissipating method, which by pleasurable by-ways conceals from the child the goal of authoritative command. But by this flattering mummery the child learns no rule and no discipline, but before his short-sighted eye all right and steadiness is converted into a merry game of chance, which hardens and accustoms him to nothing.

Further, the children, always only 'the receivers of their parents' gifts, are themselves sometimes gladly the hosts of their hosts, and do the work of love more cheerfully than that of necessity; just as their parents more willingly give than pay. Let, then, the request be proffered in the gentlest tone of voice (but without giving any reasons) and recompensed by gladness at its fulfilment; yet let not its refusal be punished. Only the slave is lashed to over-service; even the camel moves no swifter before the whip, only behind the flute. Children it has been remarked, have a particular affection for the station of their grand-parents; and how comes this but because they require and order little, and consequently their grand-children receive it the more willingly from them? Finally, can you more beautifully and soothingly extinguish the memory of a punishment than, when it is over, making the child happy by expressing a wish for a little act of courtesy to some one? More of this in the chapter on the education of the affections.

CHAPTER VII.

PUNISHMENTS.

§ 64.

THIS unchildlike word will scarcely issue from my pen: I would rather write pain or after-smart. Punishment should only apply to guilty conscience, and in the beginning children, like animals, have only an innocent one. They, as the fixed stars viewed from the mountains, should never tremble; and the earth should seem to them, as it would do from a star, glorious shining, not earthy black. Or, if you necessitate them to sacrifice and pawn their irrecoverable May-time, in order that they may thoroughly enjoy its inmost kernel in some subsequent tempestuous period of life, do you advise them any thing different from what the Indian does, who buries his gold in order to enjoy it in the next world after he himself is buried?

Great rewards, says Montesquieu, betoken a falling state; the same is true of great punishments in the schoolhouse; yea, and in the state also. Not great but unavoidable punishments are mighty, truly almighty. Hence most police punishments are usury—punishing with pounds where pence would suffice—so also are torturing cruelties, because no one dreads the wheel who scorns the gallows. There exists in men a fearful cruelty; as compassion can grow into positive pain, so the infliction of pain for punishment can grow into pleasure. It is strange, but to be proved by schoolmasters, soldiers, rustics, hunters, overseers of slaves and murderers, and by the French revolution, that wrathful cruelty is easily fanned into a pleasurable sensation, to which screams, tears, and flowing wounds actually become a refreshing spring to the thirst for blood. Among the people the blows of fate on the parents usually beget, as in a stormy sky, retaliating blows on the children. Common mothers strike their own children the harder because they see strangers do it—or because they cry too much—or because they are too silent. Is it more our subjection to jurist Rome—which considered children, as well as women, slaves and those who were not Romans—as things, not men—or more our reverence for the domestic sanctuary which explains the indifference with which the state beholds the painful judgments of parents and teachers, the tortures of defenceless innocence?

§ 65.

If the ancient Goths, Greenlanders, Quakers, and even savages, form tranquil and brave children-souls without the cane, round which ours must twine like tame snakes, we may perceive how ill we use the twig which must afterwards be thickened to a stick. The one ought to have rendered the other unnecessary. Even the smallest rod should only be used occasionally as paradigm and theme of the future; afterwards the mere threatening preaches and restrains. At the same time the reproach of Goths and savages, that blows destroy the courage of a boy, proves rather too much, because it would equally serve against every useful preventive which teaches by pain, for instance, burning the finger; and, moreover, may be disproved, partly by the example of the common German soldier, who probably gives as many blows in war as he received in time of peace, and also, partly, by that of the officers, with whom sometimes the opposite is the case.

A child who strikes should be struck, and best by the object itself, if he be old enough; by the servants, for instance. If a child be struck, say a girl, the father may be her curator sexus (guardian of the sex); on the contrary, if it be a boy who struck a boy, he would not deserve the future man's hat if he rather raised his voice than his hand, and took refuge in his father's revenging stick.

Never let the contest of parental and childish obstinacy take place; the one in punishing persistency to obtain its object, the other in enduring refractoriness. After a certain amount of exerted authority, leave to the grieved child the victory of No; you may be certain he will the next time avoid so painful a one.

Tremblingly I venture to propose suggestive questions, presupposive of the matter—such, it is well known, are forbidden to judges, because they would thereby attach to the prisoner's answer what they had first derived from it; and because, by this blackening of forbidden wares, they would soon arrive at the blackening of the accused thus urged to stumble. At the same time I would permit the educator occasionally to make use of such questions. If he know with every likelihood of truth that the child, for instance, has been on the ice, contrary to his order, he may, by the first question, which only concerns indifferent by-circumstances, as How long he has been on the pond and who was sliding with him, take away from him at once the wish and the attempt to pay the inquirer with the false silver of a lie; a wish and an attempt to which the simple question, Whether he had remained in the house would have afforded room and temptation. It is impossible that wickedness and presence of mind can be so great in a child, that in this confusing assault he will declare the seeming omniscience of the parental inquiry to be a lie, by himself giving a bold lying denial of the fact. Children, like savages, have a propensity to lie, which has chiefly reference to the past, and behind which, as Rousseau's lie about the ribbon proves, the truthfulness of riper years is developed. Baser and more dangerous than lies about what is past are prospective lies, or those about the future, by which the child, else the echo of the present, annihilating himself, declares, with the consciousness of doing so, the design of a long contrary course of bad action: the lie of the past steals good money, the lie of the future coins false. The carefully moral use of a similar leading question at least renders difficult the so dangerous success of the titular truth of a lie; for one successful lie is the mother of lies; and out of every wind-egg the devil hatches his basilisks.

One word about after-anger! A serious punishment of a child is scarcely so important as the quarter of an hour immediately succeeding, and the transition to forgiveness. After the hour of storm every seed-word finds a softened warm ground; fear and hatred of the punishment, which at first hardened and struggled against what was said, are now past, and gentle instruction falls in and heals, as honey relieves a sting and oil cures wounds. During this hour one may speak much, if the gentlest possible tone of voice be used, and soften the grief of others by showing our own. But every long winter of after-wrath is poisonous; at most an after-grief, not an after-punishment, is allowable. Mothers, viewing every thing on the foundation of love, and so treating their children like their husbands, fall easily into this after-punishment, chiefly because it better agrees with their activity, gladly dividing itself into little parts, and because they, unlike the man, who sets the stem round with thorns, willingly cover the leaves with prickles. I have dearest lady-readers, met the gentlest, mildest, "Blondinas" in public places, who, nevertheless, in the nursery (and in the servants' hall too) resembled beautiful white roses, which prick as sharply as the fullest and reddest. Unfortunately it is often the case that women, like so many authors (myself, for example) do not know when to stop and say, Halt! A word which I have hitherto vainly sought in every female dictionary, and in every female street-quarrel. Now this after-anger, this should-be-punishing appearance of loving less, either passes over the child, living only in the present and resembling a beast which immediately after the greatest pain and madness eats on peaceably, without being understood and without having any effect; or, from the same sense of the present, the child reconciles himself to the want of marks of affection, and learns to do without love: or his little heart is embittered by the continued punishment of a buried fault; and so by this after-rancour the beautiful affecting passage to forgiveness is lost, which by long gradations is weakened. But afterwards this after-tax of punishment, so dear to women, may do good service when the girl is about thirteen years old, and the boy fourteen: this later, riper age counts so much past in its present that the long regretful seriousness of a father or a mother must move and influence a youth or a maiden at the time when their hearts thirst for love; in this case coldness ripens and sweetens the fruit, whereas earlier it only kills the blossom. Is there any thing more beautiful than a mother who, after a punishment, speaks to her child with gentle earnestness and serious love? And yet there is something even more beautiful—a father who does the same.

What is to be followed as a rule of prudence, yea of justice, towards grown-up people, should be much more observed towards children; namely, that one should never judgingly declare, for instance, "You are a liar," or even, "You are a bad boy," instead of saying, "You have told an untruth," or "You have done wrong." For, since the power to command yourself implies at the same time the power of obeying, man feels, a minute after his fault, as free as Socrates; and the branding mark of his nature, not of the deed, must seem to him a blameworthy punishment. To this must be added that every individual's wrong actions, owing to his inalienable sense of a moral aim and hope, seem to him only short, usurped interregnums of the devil, or comets in the uniform solar system. The child, consequently, under such a moral annihilation, feels the wrong-doing of others more than his own; and this all the more because in him want of reflection, and the general warmth of his feelings, represent the injustice of others in a more ugly light than his own.

If it be permitted to the state only to declare actions, not men, dishonourable—except in cases where it adjudges the loss of life with that of honour, because loss of honour is the extinction of humanity; and every heart, however degraded, still preserves indestructible the life-germ that may grow up into the restoration of the man:—then is it still more sinful, by the cruel frost of ignominious punishment, to injure this life-seed in the child, which as yet only bears unripe and growing members. You may give him as rewards, coats of arms, chains and stars of orders, and doctors' hats—or, as punishments, take all these away; but do not let the punishments of honour be greater; that is to say, do not let them be positive, as the dunces' caps and wooden horses of many schools are. Shame is the cold Orcus of the inner man; a spiritual hell, without redemption, wherein the damned can become nothing else but at most one devil more. Therefore, even Gedicken's advice, to oblige a child deserving punishment to write a thesis about his fault, is to be rejected (except at a somewhat later period); for what else can this raking up of the inner slough produce but either foul, complete sinking and incrustation of the fallen child, or poisonous stunning of the better by marsh exhalations? And does not the tender being thus harden and accustom himself to a contradiction between words and feelings? Somewhat similar is the punishment of kissing the hand which has inflicted chastisement. The state and education do so mutually work after and imitate one another! I only cite as an example the disgraceful retraction of an injury. For, as no civic power can remove the opinion of the injurer, the command to revoke his words is only the command for a lie, and every other punishment would be juster and more acceptable, than this dictated self-profanation, whereby the man—against other rules of justice—must show himself up as the house-witness of his own shame. Only the judge, not one of the parties, can justly (not morally) restore honour to the other; for else he could also take away what he gave back.* Still stranger is it that in the more refined degrees of recantation the defendant loses in his own honour what of another's he restores to the plaintiff—like a master of the mint who becomes bankrupt. But back to our ill-treated child! Are not the wounds which an honoured warrior scarcely feels made deep and burning by dishonour? so the dishonoured and helpless being struck by two blows hangs between heaven and earth, scourged both in body and soul, and languishingly desolate. But, ye parents and teachers, in a less degree, but in the same way, do you inflict inward and outward torments on the weak hearts when—as is so often—you surround with thorns the corporeal, or other punishments, by derision of their appearance, or by ludicrous names. Never let the least pain be inflicted scoffingly, but seriously, oftener sadly. The sorrow of the parents purifies that of the child. For example, if the royal pupil of Fénelon gave way to ebullitions of passion, this bishop of Cambray—more properly of Patmos, for he might have been the second disciple whom Jesus loved—commanded all the servants to wait on the king's son seriously and silently, and so let stillness preach.

CHAPTER VIII.

SCREAMING AND CRYING OF CHILDREN.

§ 66.

THE best about this is already written, and the gleanings, too, along with it. All that need be done more is—to do what is written; and this I expect from the women for the first time if they have children in the second world, or at all events in the third. But now their weak, five-sensed heart is driven to and fro by the crying and screaming of children, as by winds and waves; and, since they themselves often perform miracles with the liquidising blood of St. Januarius, that is, with tears, it is natural that they should melt at the flowing tears of others. Only to the man, for whom eye-water frequently becomes a petrifying water, shall a few mollifying considerations be here presented; so that every screaming of a child shall not make him a savage, a beast, and worse than a beast.

* But here nothing is said or is above intended against (rather for) the old German fashion which, without judicial intervention, left simply to the two parties (for an honour-stealer was forthwith a judge of honour before the end of the matter) the determination of their honours by a trial of strength.

As Rubens by one stroke converted a laughing into a crying child, so nature frequently makes this stroke in the original: a child's eye, like the sun, never draws water so readily as in the hot temperature of pleasure; for instance, after the return from a playing party of children. Their mirth very easily passes beyond the first extreme verge, which, by exhaustion, leads to the second. Moreover, consider that children have their hypochondriacal sufferings—days and hours of rain, just as much as their parents; that the four great seasonal wheels on quarter days also affect young nerves, and that the child's quicksilver easily falls and rises with that in the glass, before storms and cold weather.*

You should not, however, consider it in order to give more way to it, or more to ward it off, but just to make nothing out of it, neither anxiety nor sermons.

Since women so willingly translate their sensations into words, and by their talkativeness distinguish themselves, more than we do ourselves, from parrots, among which class of birds the females talk little—hence only the males are brought to Europe—so we must consider the prologue to speech in little girls, that is, some crying and screaming, as the overflow of the future stream. A boy must digest his pain without water, a girl may have a few drops after it.

* The parallel line, or rather parallel zigzag, between our corporeal world and the outer universe would have been correctly laid down long ago if the great changes produced by the weather in our bodies had not appeared in the weaker part before their occurrence, in some along with it, and in stronger natures afterwards, so that the same weather makes one person ill which seems to restore another, on whom, in fact, the future is exerting its influence. From a similar reason the mother of the ebb and flow of the tide, the moon, was so long unknown because they followed her after an interval of hours or even days.

Children have, in common with weak men, an incapability of instantaneous cessation from what they are doing. Often no threatening can stop their laughter: remember the converse in their crying, in order to treat their weakness as a physician rather than as a judge.

§ 67.

We may divide children's hurts, or crying at hurts, into four, like the four feelers of a snail, with which they touch the ground. First, screaming about some outward hurt, a fall for instance. Here nothing is more injurious than—what is so desirable in all requisitions to the child—the soft, compassionate mother's voice: the compassion of another joins in with what he feels for himself, and he cries on for pleasure. Either say dryly, "Courage," "Be quiet," "It doesn't signify;" or, still better, repeat some merry old Da-capo word, "Hoppa" for instance. The strength or weakness of the child must decide whether you should in the first case choke the pain by an absolute forbiddal of its outbreak—since victory over the sign by distraction and division becomes a victory over the thing—or, in the second, let nature heal itself by those inner-home methods, which in grown-up people are exclamations and curses, and tears and noise. You need not answer me, "Very common advice," for I reply, "But of very rare accomplishment." The unaltered course of old counsellors ought to produce an improved one in the hearers.

§ 68.

In the second kind of crying, on the contrary, that caused by illness, the gentle, soothing mother's voice is in its right place—namely, by the sick bed. And for what other reason than this, because the little spiritual I or I-let, whose place it is to govern and direct the physical, is itself attacked and plundered, and the mind, lying in iron chains, knows not how to bear "the order of the iron crown"? Here you must indulge complainings, yet without paying more attention to them than at other times. Maintain the spiritual regimen, even if you must change the physical. Children in sickness are morally distorted; the sick-bed improves—the sick-cradle injures. No sick child ever yet died of good education. But why are we so serious on this point but because too frequently, in private, the whole education of childish humanity is only made into the nurse of physical progress; as (if the expression may be allowed) men use the holy breath of life to turn the sails of windmills, and the next world as a swimming bladder on our earth? Bad enough! Every unholy thing sets before itself (and others) a period from which it will first begin to contemplate the eternity of the Holy; as if humanity were attached to some future year, the twentieth, thirtieth, sixtieth, instead of to every present moment. Where, and in what age and place, will the fear of hurting life by the strict consistency of education be overcome? Think always only of the best; the good will soon appear.

§ 69.

The third kind of crying is that used to get something. Here hold fast Rousseau's advice, Never let the child obtain an inch of ground by this war-cry; only the misfortune is, women are never to be moved to this patient indifference towards screaming. But they say to him, "No, you shall have nothing while you are so naughty; but, when you have done crying, you shall see what I will give you." And does the little despot want anything more? The greatest thing it might be permitted a mother to do in her distress would be, if her little tributary king were young enough, to bring down and offer him the usual tribute and exchequer bills, instead of this extraordinary war-tax; i.e., to grant him a different, instead of the required, gift. But, heavens! has one then never seen how happy a child is who knows no orders, and consequently no foreign stubbornness—who skips away as laughingly after a no, as after a yes—who by no changing arbitrariness between permission and restraint, between yes and no, to which a victorious screaming fit always leads in the end, has not yet made the first bitter experience of injustice; and who, consequently, receives no other nor deeper wounds than those which can strike the body? Mothers, have you never yet seen this happy child? Try it, for an experiment, in one point; for instance, strictly forbid your child of about two years and three-quarters old ever to touch your watch, even if the watch lie openly every day on your work-table, and only act thus three days together so as never to contradict yourself—you will curse your former “forfeit moneys.”

§ 70.

Against the fourth kind of crying—about loss, from fear, from vexation—the imposition of some occupation is useful. Or thus: you earnestly demand the child's attention, and begin a long speech; it is quite indifferent where it at last ends; it is sufficient that the child has exerted himself and forgotten his misfortune. The thunder-spark of a harsh word is very good—“Quiet!” for instance. Never let the mind's green and yellow sickness—ill-temper—spread over the whole being. Hence it is very important, especially with little children, never to wait for the full outbreak of ill-humour, but at once to mark and repress its first smallest indication. For the rest, never put to flight naughtinesses which die away with years by those which grow with years: the tears of childhood dry up before the sighs of manhood commence.

CHAPTER IX.

ON THE TRUSTFULNESS OF CHILDREN.

§ 71.

LONG before the child can speak he understands the speech of others, and that without gestures or cadence in the voice; just as we understand a foreign language without being able to speak it. It is for this reason that this chapter is placed here.

One need but lend nearer objects to the child-faith (fides implicita) of the elder theologians,* and their expression becomes important and true. If the child have in his own father a holy father, with all the advantages of infallibility, and with the additional protection of a holy mother—if, retaining the discourse of a stranger at once with belief and unbelief, he bring it to his parents and ask, Is it true?—if to him, according to the primary propositions of the Wolfian philosophy, the father be the proposition of the sure foundation, the mother the proposition of doubt and the teacher the proposition of the undistinguishable;—if he, believing without proof, set a pair of human beings against the whole outer world and equal to his own inner world; if, when threatened, he rely with no more confidence on the bodily strength of the parental arms than on their spiritual power; if all this be so, it reveals a treasure of humanity which, to value according to its worth, we need but to find and behold in older hearts. What then rests on this yet unmeasured faith in men? In the intellectual world nearly every thing; and in the moral world at least as much.

The intellectual world, it is true, will be least ready to grant this of itself. But what do we know of any island whatever which a voyager discovers more than our faith in him gives? Or what of whole continents? A rough seafarer by his testimony governs a geographic continent in the learned world. If you oppose to me the multitude of witnesses—although few distant countries have as many witnesses as a testamentary document—I answer, Even out of the multitude of witnesses no weight of probability would ensue if the great faith in one individual were not strengthened by the multiplication of individuals. Man believes man more readily about the distant and the vast—about former centuries and quarters of the globe, than about what is near and small; and he does not permit in a stranger the probability of a lie to increase with the facility and impunity of uttering it, but with the very reverse.

Thus we glean our Roman and Grecian history chiefly from their own testimony—for we ourselves contradict the Persians ~~who~~ contradict Herodotus—and we do not make half the difficulty about the collateral testimony of a thousand other witnesses (for no historian ever experienced all that he calls to life and describes) concerning a succession of a million actions, which lawyers do about one single matter of fact for which they require two witnesses. What gives us this certainty? Faith in humanity, and so in men, and consequently in one individual.

* Who understood thereby the faith imparted to children and heathens in the hour of death.

So, further, the sciences of medicine, of astronomy, natural history, chemistry, are built up sooner and more extensively on others' experience than on our own: consequently on faith. Even our convictions from philosophical calculations call in trust in others to aid the probability that we have not miscalculated. And wherefore does an irresistible longing impel us so strongly to the opinions of great men about the foundations of our being, about God and our own souls, but because we believe their assurances more than the proofs of others and of ourselves? And how does not intoxicated youth hang—like bees on flowering lime-trees—drinking in the spirit of a celebrated teacher?

But this faith reveals most richly its glorious form when its object is moral. Here the heart is refreshed by true bliss-imparting faith. In the intellectual world one trusts to what you say—in the moral, to what you are. As lovers trust each other, as the friend trusts the friend, and the noble heart trusts humanity, and the faithful trust God—this is the Peter's rock, the fast foundation of human worth. Alexander, who drank the suspicious medicine, was greater than the physician who made it healing instead of poisonous; it is nobler to exercise a dangerous confidence than to deserve it: but wherein consists the divinity of this trustfulness? Not by any means merely in this—that you cannot presuppose any power of vital danger in another without knowing and possessing it actively in yourself—for you may both know and possess it, and yet not presuppose it; and then in dangers, as in the case of Alexander, the trustful only is endangered—not the trusted. But herein consists the triumphal banner of faith in humanity, and the civic crown of heaven; that the trusting must forbear and remain quiet—which, as in war, so in everything else, is more difficult than to do and struggle—and that faith, although the matter in hand be but a single case, yet beholds and embraces all cases, a whole life. He who rightly trusts shows that he has seen the moral deity face to face; and there is, perhaps, no higher moral gratification on earth than this—if sense and testimony attack the friend in your heart to hurl him thence, even then to stand by him with the God in you, to preserve and to love him, not as formerly, but more deeply.

Therefore, if this trustfulness be the holy spirit in man, a lie is the sin against that spirit; since we place another's word so high—even above our own—that according to Pascal, a man to whom any sin was ascribed would at last believe and realise it. Platner maintains that the weaker the brain the more readily it believes, as is seen in drunken persons, sickly women, and children: but the question here becomes whether this (merely physical) weakness which affords room for so many tender developments of the heart—for love, inspiration, religion, poetry—does not prepare, though at the cost of the other powers, the true, pure loneliness of absolute dominion to the holiest of the perceptions, the perception of the holiness of others? The English are more easy of belief than any other nation, but neither weaker nor weak: they hate a lie too much ever to presuppose it.

§ 72.

I return to the trustfulness of children. Nature has, as if figuratively, richly prepared them for reception: the bones of the ear are, according to Haller, the only ones which are as large in the child as in the grown-up man; or, to use another simile, the veins of imbibition are, according to Darwin, the fuller the younger they are. Holily preserve childlike trust, without which there can be no education. Never forget that the little dark child looks up to you as to a lofty genius, an apostle full of revelations, whom he trusts altogether more absolutely than his equals, and that the lie of an apostle destroys a whole moral world. Wherefore never bury your infallibility by useless proofs, nor by confessions of error: the admission of your ignorance comports better with you. Power and scepticism the child can sufficiently early, and not at your charges, polemically and protestantly exercise and strengthen on the declared opinions of strangers.

Do not in the least degree support religion and morality by reasons: even the multitude of pillars darken and contract churches. Let the Holy in yourself be directed (without lock and turnkey) to the Holy in the child. Faith—like the innate morality, the patent of the nobility of humanity brought with it from heaven—opens the little heart to the great old heart. To injure this faith is to resemble Calvin who banished music out of the churches: for faith is the echo of the heavenly music of the spheres.

When in your last hour—think well of it—all in the broken spirit fades and dies, poems, thoughts, strivings, rejoicings: even then the night-flower of faith still blooms on and refreshes with its perfume in the last darkness.

APPENDIX TO THE THIRD FRAGMENT.

ON PHYSICAL EDUCATION.

THE expression is, properly, false; for as the science of care of the body it would equally apply to beasts, strong men, and the aged; the cook would be a Labonne, and the kitchen a magazine of school-books. Permit me here to insert some observations on attention to the bodies of children which I addressed to a newly-married man shortly before his wife's confinement. (Some readers will not agree so theoretically with this letter as my three children, who, during the printing and distribution of the first edition, were educated in accordance with it, practically did, by their flourishing condition.)

You may freely inform your dear wife why I write now on this point instead of half a year later; namely, because she is now still trustful, but will, in time to come, be as disobedient as possible. I have known the most intelligent women who have really assisted and followed up the wishes of their most intelligent husbands in regard to the physical care of their child until the second had not yet arrived; but then, or at most when the fourth came, the dietetic kitchen-Latin and medicinal patois of the women assumed the government, and nothing more could be effected than one or two propositions without results.

A woman during her first pregnancy might easily commit to memory Hufeland's "Good Advice to Mothers," since in the new edition there would be but three and a half pages to be learned monthly.

"But Heaven preserve every one from that timid over-carefulness with mistrusts nature, and has every child's tooth extracted by the physician or apothecary! If one venture nothing upon children, yet one ventures themselves; their bodies probably, their minds certainly. Only let a person observe the rosy children in lonely villages, where the whole Brownian apothecary's shop has nothing in its phials save brandy; or the descendants of savages compared with the fading Flora of noble houses, for which every-day draughts of every possible kind are compounded.

However, nowhere is Hufeland's "Good Advice to Mothers" less attended to than in the huts of peasants and beggars. There one sees many little pale creatures looking out of the narrow windows when one goes out on sledging expeditions. But they bloom again with the earth; the open air makes them rosy sooner than the sun does the apple.

Hunters, savages, mountaineers, soldiers—all contend with all their powers for the advantages of fresh air; all those who have lived to be a century and a half old were beggars; and in fact if a man wish to become nothing but old, and to continue nothing but healthy, there is no more wholesome, fresh-air-imbibing exercise than begging; nevertheless mothers believe that a child, placed for half an hour at an open window, inhales out of a town, which itself is but a larger room and merely contains street air instead of house air, as much ethereal breath as is necessary to purify and cleanse twenty-three hours and a half of cavern air. Does no one remember, or no one remind her with all her dread of air, that during the miserable autumn weather she travelled, on account of the war, three days long, with her infant baby in an open vehicle through the pure fresh air, without any other particular injury than that of being brought hither? Could no chemist, by visible representations of the different kinds of poisonous air, impart to the mothers in towns a sense of the value of heaven's free air, in order to break them of their carelessness about the only invisible and ever active element?

Why do you write,—“I fear nothing so much as the procuring of a wet-nurse”?—Two of my children, precisely the strongest, were brought up without the breast. But if a nurse be commonly healthy, and have not much less given her to do, nor much more to eat than during her necessitous solitude, she may any day enter your service. Certainly I do not offer myself as security against any mental poisoning by her morals and care, any more than

I do for all women servants from the midwife downwards; an honest, old, but good-tempered man-servant, your John, for instance, would be much better for a child's heart than any nurse and child's maid; just as at a later period, for the same reason, children are more spoiled and enervated in the friendly, praising, indulgent society of women than in the cold, dry company of men. As regards the physical empoisonment of the milk by mental excitement, I should prefer the nurse to the lady. One often sees a common mother, as a bombarding ship or bomb-shell, foster that kind of conversation with another woman which is the only one in this world that has never grown wearisome and which men call wrangling and abusing; but the suckling has observed or cried little about it. On the contrary, a lady, whom a false stitch of her maid, like the sting of a tarantula, sets into an armed dance, may poison it three or four times a day. What concerns another mental poison-draught for the child I utterly deny. If, as I believe I am able to prove, no partial transmigration of soul from the mother into the new-born child be possible, how much less can mind influence mind by means of a nourishment which first affects the stomach! One might just as well believe, with the Caribbees, that pork produces small eyes; or, with the Brazilians, that the flesh of ducks imparts the lazy awkward pace of a duck.* On this principle, goat's milk, and perhaps most nurses' milk, would have the same effect as that of Jupiter's nurse, which so completely transformed the god that he may be employed as anything rather than an example of many of the ten commandments. Bechstein, it is true, remarks that otters may be tamed by human milk; but one may find a much nearer and truer cause in the circumstances which such a milk-diet presupposes.

Much contention may take place about the relation of the mother's milk to the child's body. If a healthy stomach, like death, make all alike, potatoes, bread, venison steaks, ship biscuits, ale, insects (crabs), worms (snails), and, finally, human flesh, into the same chyle, will not the stomach of a child be able to reduce its nurse's milk to the same substance? And does not the child's body, in all its organic peculiarities, as frequently resemble its father as its mother? Why, if the milk (instead of organisation) effect so much, are not most of the nobility giants, since peasants' milk is often added to aristocratic blood as wine to water? Indeed, on the ground of the influence of maternal relationship, there would be more to determine for, than against, a nurse. The body ceaselessly polarises itself; consequently the nitrogen, for instance, of the nurse would counterbalance the oxygen of the lady; and, on the other side, a town lady would be the best official nurse of a peasant boy. A cosmopolite tutor and diet master might go still farther, and, in order all-sidedly to exercise and train a swaddled child—mummies are swaddled corpses and helmsmen swaddled men—insist on its having one day, ass's milk (the positive pole, thesis), the next, dog's milk (the negative pole, antithesis), the day after, human milk (indifference, synthesis).

* Home's 'History of Mankind,' vol. ii.

As early as possible determine the hours of eating, and consequently the times for sleep; only observing that in the first years the intervals must be more frequent and shorter than afterwards.

The stomach is such a creature of habit, such a time-keeper, that if, when hungry, we delay its usual period of gratification for a few hours, it does nothing but reject food. But if its hours of compulsory service be appointed it works beyond its powers. It is only in later years when the sketch and colours of the little man are more strongly marked that middle tints and half shadows may be ventured on; a child, like a savage, is often freed, often made a slave, by sleep and eating; the physical nature is then either exercised or vanquished, and the spiritual is crowned in both cases.

Do not keep the tumult of daily life far distant from the little infant, as though it were an aristocratic patient. If you do not actually permit the fire bell or the discharge of artillery to be heard by its cradle, its long deep slumber in the world will so harden it against every noise, that afterwards, when its ears are quicker, it will yet be able to sleep in the midst of noise; and what is still better, and prevents injurious night-feeding, it will only sleep all the sounder in the contrasting stillness of night. I earnestly contend against suckling in the night; for your wife ought to sleep; and it is quite sufficient if she suckle her little darling, shortly before going to sleep, and then again immediately after waking. It is a trifle, but so is a line; why may I not give one to the other? I mean, why do you lay the head of a new-born child higher than its body? In the months preceding birth the body actually stood on the head; I should think that a horizontal direction after a perpendicular was quite sufficient; wherefore, then, create a new want, or prevent the subsequent use of a remedy, which the higher placing of the head is to children in case of colds, by employing it before it is needed?

With regard to animal food, most people say—Wait till there are teeth to bite it. Why? toothless children take, with advantageous effects, broths, and the strongest honey-thick extract of meat that I know, the yolk of eggs. Even flesh-meat is less to be objected to on account of its size, since it may be cut quite as small as it can be chewed, than on account of its being swallowed without chewing, that is, without saliva. But children enjoy and digest milk and broth almost entirely without previous gastric juice, the saliva, as birds of prey do pieces of flesh. Probably large pieces are chiefly injurious because we take more of them and quicker than little ones in the same time: for the stomach reckons satiety—in hunger as in thirst—not according to quantity (for a pint of water will frequently not quench the thirst as well as a slice of lemon) but according to organic assimilation: hence of no kind of food does one more easily eat so much too much as of what is indigestible; because the difficult and more tardy assimilation delays and conceals the feeling of satiety. What digestion is, no physiologist has hitherto been able to explain. The gastric juice which is said to excite or produce hunger (is there any thirst juice for thirst?) with its few spoonfuls is not sufficient—when diluted and surrounded by a bottle of wine and a plate of soup, as a grain of arsenic by oil—to dissolve a Styrian cock's comb, not to mention an early meal, or even a late one. The gentle animal warmth which, as August is the wine-cook, ought to be the cooking-wine of food, is cooled and deluged by cold liquids with less of disadvantage than advantage to the digestion. If the stomach of men, as their nature in general, work as an ellipse, with two foci, and so not merely as a membranaceous vulture stomach, but also as a fleshy poultry stomach, and along with chemical possess also mechanical force, I do not understand how a pressure—that, for instance, of meat-broth or of gruel—assists it in digestion.

But we are concerned with the thing itself, not with its explanation. Flesh-meat seems especially useful to counteract the weakness of childhood and the superabundance of sour food; since even the young of granivorous birds are fed advantageously with eggs, worms and insects. A slight and rare surfeit will exercise and strengthen the stomach's power of endurance: only do not let the beast of burden be overloaded with easily injurious substances, such as eggs or meat, but with things of moderately long duration, such as pulse or potatoes.

Why do not people give children, at times when they will not take their food, sugar (as distinct from confections as food from poison) on whose nourishing substance the negro feeds himself and his horse during journeys of days together?

During the earliest years—I was about to commence so again, but without any reason,—for the strict ordering of life only comprehends a period sufficiently long to raise and fasten the scaffolding of life. But as the danger of death diminishes every day—it is well known to be greatest at first—growing freedom and powerful many-sidedness must arm the child against all the two-and-thirty winds and storms of life.

Tea and coffee, as well as cakes and fruit, are generally given much more willingly and abundantly to children than wholesome wine as a tonic, and wholesome hopped beer as a drink; whereas it were much better not to give the two liquids at all, cakes very seldom, and fruit abundantly only in the early glowing years. As to the emperor Joseph II., who by an ordinance of 1785 forbade that wine should be given to children* (somewhat as tobacco, hops, and Peruvian bark were at an earlier date prohibited)—I put him to flight by the children of the many wine-countries, who have not yet perished thereby; else would there meanwhile be no longer a right bank to the Rhine—to leave the left out of the question. By all means give them wine, (but not any old, Spanish or Hungarian,) not out of a punch-ladle, but out of a teaspoon, and more frequently than abundantly, and every year less, and in the season of manly strength and vigour none at all. Bitter beer, at a proper distance from two meals, is at once excitement and nourishment. Afterwards, in the eighth and tenth years, water must be the drink and beer the tonic. I would not merely allow girls to drink beer longer than boys, but always; unless the mothers, like true Lycurguses, forbid growing fat. Thank God, my friend, in the name of your posterity, that you, like myself, do not live in Saxony, or in the Saxon Voigtland, but in Baireuth, near the best beer—the champagne beer.

* No imperial law would be less likely than this to be observed in

White beer without hops is a slimy poison for children; and unhopped brown beer not much better. Those who are too fat should only take it in water, as the Greeks did wine. In the early ages of Germany, before tea, coffee, and foreign wine ruled and weakened, fourfold stronger beer was brewed; then people did not dig the bones of giants out of the earth, but frequently consigned them to it; whereas for us, under the government of concentrated tea and coffee poison, the only antidote, beer, is weakened.

About one point, my friend (forgive my following no other order than that of yourself and your wishes) you will in future often grow hot or cold towards your gentle wife, at least I expect so—and that is, actually about heat and cold. It is a well-known fact that more than one excellent author has much prolonged the continuance of the honey-moon, holding it to resemble the year-weeks of Daniel, and has only fixed its certain end after the birth of the first child; concerning this, however, there has been much quarrelling : partly on the man's side with medical reasons, and partly on the woman's with her own ; I mean this in case the child be healthy ; if it be sickly perfect rage ensues. I once wrote a paragraph on this subject in case I should ever experience the happiness of forming myself on my own principles of education.

Scotland, where the smallest children before they grow up into the strongest Scots, have brandy given to them.—Humphry Clinker's Travels, vol. iii. p. 19.

Since women, like a born parlour-race, or household divinity—we are merely sea, land, and air gods ; or, compared to those domesticated doves, kindly-meaning but untamed wild pigeons—love warmth as they do coffee, and so, besides covering, seek all manner of warm wraps, only far too many for one body ; and would rather have nine accumulated veils and shawls than one, though of the largest, and for that reason lay aside furs, however warm and costly they be ; therefore it is that these mentally tropical beings willingly press their preferences and necessities on the beings they love best—their children. But does not nature herself at birth make the most marked change when she casts it out of an organic bed, which she herself warmed, through the air, into a lifeless one for which the child must be the bed-warmer ? To which is to be added the partial and, moreover, injurious uncovering, that of the face and head, after the previous uniform warmth of the whole body. Hence the question might be mooted, whether the head of the new-born infant—so hairless, so thin-skulled and unclosed—does not need to be protected by warm coverings more, or at least as much as the other members, if many men, among whom we, the whole congregated posterity of our ancestors, are to be reckoned, had not hitherto withstood it and are still alive : so richly does Nature gush forth in new springs whether you close against her one or one hundred. In the meantime she receives the child after this transit from the hot zone of the earth into the cold one, with two invigorating provocatives ; with nourishment for the lungs and nourishment for the stomach—two hitherto unemployed members. Well, then, let the mother imitate therein the universal mother, and not let the child fly from external cold, but conquer it by excitements to inward warmth. The best fur-coat for children grows on wine mountains. Joy is the warm sunny side of the mind and of the body. Exercise is the third non-conductor of frost. The new eulogists of warmth are only in the right when they are interrupted. In the cold air of a room a child would shrivel up like a plant on the top of a mountain; but it would do the same in everlasting heat: the strongest men are not produced either in the immediate neighbourhood of the equator, or of the poles, but in the temperate zones, which alternate between frost and warmth, but with a preponderance of the latter. Do not let any apartments for children be cold, with the exception of the sleeping-room; for bed is of itself an external fur covering, and sleep an internal one; and what additional warmth is possible, in case of illness, if you have already more than reached the degree permitted? If you allow your future Paul (if I may venture to choose his godfather before you) to go without shoes (which would be to you but a saving of leather, but to him of a whole funeral train of evils); or if you order your future Paulina (to whom he will, probably, with gentlemanly politeness permit the first entrance into life, for most first children are females,) to go without stockings, though soled or shoed, then, in every illness where a warm foot-bath is advisable, you can give one of the longest duration simply* by a pair of shoes and stockings. I had my reasons, friend, for recommending shoes, as though they were bridal shoes, to your Paulina, although, alas! along with them all the corns, cold feet, thin tender soles and heels, which a shoe includes. For I know from afar off the despair, the womanly dread, lest feet without shoes should really grow as large as nature intended, and so quite beyond the conventional size of a foot. Our Chinese Podolatry (foot-worship) more readily suffers the nakedness of the higher parts, for instance, of the bosom or of the back, than for a girl to go barefoot. Luckily—in this case—a boy is not a girl. So let him dance barefoot through his young world, like the ancient heroes, who are always represented with bare feet. If his foot grow into a pedestal, what signifies it to us two men, since we and even rational women, care so little about it?

Why do mothers talk a hundred times about taking cold, and scarcely once about becoming over-heated, which, especially in winter, so readily passes into fatal cold? I shall answer this in a very unexpected way, when I say, It is because winter lies nearest to their heart, and consequently most in their eyes. Winter is, in fact, the bleacher and fair colourer of their faces, and they approach the snow as a new whitening material; hence summer is much too warm for them to uncover their necks and shoulders as they do in winter which does not discolour them. Hence those tender chamber-covered nurslings, lily-white and lily-fragile, come from the north, and resemble those white blades of grass which may be found under stones in the midst of green spring. Certainly this dazzling winter-snow does not bear the fruits of the true blossom-snow, for which, nevertheless, we often mistake it, as we do beauty for strength.

A fortunate accident for daughters is the Grecian garment-fashion of the present Gymnosophists, (naked female runners,) which, it is true, injures the mothers, but hardens the daughters; for as age and custom should avoid every fresh cold, so youth exercises itself on it, as on every hardship, until it can bear still greater.

The Unalasks (hear it, ye enemies of every hardening process!) dip a crying child into the sea until it is quiet; it necessarily afterwards grows the stronger for it.* So, simile-wise, the present naked manner of dressing is a cold bath into which the daughters are dipped, who usually grow cheerful in it. A physician should always invent the fashions; since he cannot remove a new one except by something still newer.

A system of physical hardening is, indeed, mentally necessary, because the body is the anchor-ground of courage. Its aim and consequence is not so much health and prolongation of life—for weakly and sensual persons often grow old, and nuns and court ladies still oftener—as a fortification against weakness of character, and for cheerfulness and activity. As it is not a woman's but only a man's mind which becomes more womanish by effeminacy, it may easily happen in the higher ranks, in which the men are, comparatively, more effeminate than the women, that the weak will surpass the weakened sex: and men and women have the delightful prospect of resembling date-trees, of which the female only produces fruit, the male nothing but flowers.

* See Kant's Phys. Geog. von Vollmeier, vol. iii. 1st div.

The present fashion in dress, regarded as an air bath establishment, might have its end more perfectly obtained among children, if the garments were occasionally entirely laid aside. I mean, why do not we give ourselves, but still more our children, the pleasure of playing naked half a day in the warm air and sunshine, like Adam in his paradise of innocence?

In ancient Germany, where our ancestors tasted the forbidden fruit later, and consequently hung the fig-leaves later round them, the children were permitted, as in Egypt, to remain ten years longer in nakedness: what spirits physical power must not have stepped from their cold forests, when eighteen hundred years of warmth and luxury have not sufficed to make their descendants weaker than either of us two! So the wood of stripped trees can bear a greater weight than that of those which retain their bark.

One need but see how light, active, and refreshed an unclothed child feels, drinking and swimming through the air, moving its muscles and limbs freely, and ripening in the sun like a fruit from which the leaves have been removed. So many children's games are Olympic and gymnastic, let the children, then, at least be Greeks, that is to say, unclothed.

The cold water bath may be best used immediately after the air bath; if, in other respects, it may be unconditionally recommended to children under four years old. There is, however, one substitute for the bath; that of a baptism in daily colder water of the whole body, though each limb be only wet in turns and quickly rubbed dry. I permitted this Anabaptist (re-immersing) sin against Brown and his followers to be perpetrated every day upon my own children: the consequences were, not chilliness, colds and weakness, but the very reverse.* Schwarz, in his treatise on education, regards the dislike of a child to this treatment as a hint from nature; but then the same reason would apply to many medicines, and also to the warm bath, which children struggle against in the first instance, because they feel all at once so many unaccustomed delights.

* With regard to the advantages of coldness without retardation, as to how such sun-obscurations exist, see Vorschule der Aesthetik, iii. p. 578.

If cold water have medicinal powers for the stomach which evaporate when warmed, so has it also for the imbibing skin. After air, cold and warm baths, sleep is beneficial.

There is still one kind of bath, hitherto unused, which would be very advantageous both to parents and children, I mean a thunder-storm bath. Physicians employ in their experiments on nervous invalids, electric air, electric plates, electric baths; but thunder, or rather thunder water, they have not as yet prescribed. Have they never experienced that a person never feels so fresh, cheerful and elastic as after a warm or tepid rain has penetrated to the skin? Since human beings, when dry again after a storm, feel so much invigorated, and the world of flowers still more so, why will they not receive this united fire and water baptism from above, and suffer themselves to be raised and healed by the wonder-working arm in the thunder cloud?

One ought to have an especial rain or bathing suit of clothes, as a frequenter of the spring cloud-baths; and then, when there is promise of wet weather, make a rain party, and return home dripping.

The bath company must, alas! change their clothes—the only thing about it which does not please me. The shepherd boy, even in the cold rainy days of November, takes no chest of clothes with him to the field; neither does any French soldier who has marched himself warm all day in the rain, and lies down at night on the cold ground; the fisher stands with his feet in the water and his head in the sun, precisely breaking and reversing the physician's rule;—yet the only hundred-and-seventy year old man in England was a fisher, and had previously been a soldier and a beggar! Heavens! with what a fair playground and free city of the body is our mind originally surrounded! and how long must it have been the slave of sin and of opinion ere it was condemned to be the chained helmsman or ship-mover of the body!

Mental all-sidedness, which means all-powerfulness, is not granted us, but physical is; now let childhood at least be formed for this, and the body, which can inhabit all countries, be exercised in accommodating itself to all; as the Russian does who imitates his own empire, a miniature Europe in climate, and endures a vapour-and-ice-bath, and the extremes of hunger and of repletion. Is it not enough to be so pampered as to make a pillow of a snow-ball?—and now do we actually use a cloak bag, or even a feather bed? *

I add to the above remarks, that parents in physical matters—alas! that it should happen in morals—ought to require more from their children than from themselves: in accordance with this, let the rain-wet clothes at appointed times dry on the children.

Would that every mother would consider that, as she opposes inoculation to natural small-pox, so, on the same grounds, she should oppose the blow of accidental, unexpected, and therefore unprepared-for danger, by the favourable hardening of versatile childhood when the choice of the battle-field is so easy!

Our modern women might more readily imitate the ancient Germans in every point than in this; of becoming ministers of the art of healing, and so the midwives of the future world. If I were a physician, or an important teacher in a girls' school, I should consider it my most useful work to prepare a medical 'Theory of Doubts' for women; I would therein merely ask questions, give a hundred answers to each, and then ask them to choose. I would, for instance, lay quite undecided before them the theory of fever in all its infinite variety, yes, and even the thousand causes of headache, the intermixture of which so much increases it. Whosoever, even in the cradle, gave attention to the science of medicine—a science in which, more than in any other, genius and learning should form one indivisible compound being—would be astonished at the boldness with which any no-doctor, and his wife into the bargain, pronounces on the parentage, name and progeny of every illness. Good heavens! my friend, women think they understand something, we will say the very smallest part, of the most difficult of all applied sciences, that which is applied to the various mental and physical nature united undistinguishably in one organisation; whereas whole cities would thank God if there were to be had in each of them but one graduated man, universal doctor, medical counsellor, and first physician, who would assist you less to heaven than to your legs again; and would not, as if he were a pope, regard every pilgrim on this earth as a pilgrim of the cross, whom he had to send forth to win a consecrated grave (if he deserved one). The best physician is a prize in the lottery; the best medicine from him is a prize in the lottery. And yet every woman considers herself to be both lotto and lottery; at once both the great prize, and that fifth in order!

* In Home's 'History of Mankind,' p. 384, is the following: A party of Highlanders were overtaken by night, and encamped upon the smooth snow. A somewhat pampered youth, of good birth, wished to make himself more comfortable, and rolled himself a small pillow out of the snow. "What," said his father (Sir Evan Cameron), "will you be so womanish?" and kicked with his foot the snow pillow away from under his head.—Ah! our ideal would be to rival only the son of Sir Evan Cameron.

Whence comes this absurd pretension to the art of healing among women and—let us include ourselves—among other human beings, myself for instance (whose whole letter proves it) and among men of former ages, as the old Latin proverb testifies*, and Eufenspiegel also, to whom every passer-by prescribed a cure for his toothache? This folly proceeds from a hundred causes; for instance, from the confusion of the science of medicine and the art of surgery; from the differences among physicians; from anxiety and affection, &c. &c.—but, I believe, chiefly from trust in the proposition of a sufficient reason. Man, a cause-seeking animal as well as one of mere habit,—however modestly he may listen to all scientific things which end in history or mere information, to all histories of the world or of nature, to information about measurement, coining, language, arms, antiquity, history,—this man cannot restrain his power and insight when any scientific theory is presented to him, whether it be of the subject in hand, of nature, of morals, of taste, of sickness. The peasant gives his opinion about the causes of the world, of a thunder storm, of sin, of a performance on the organ, of bodily pain; for in all these cases he draws his theory entirely out of himself.

* Fingunt se medicos quivis idiota, sacerdos, Judæus, monachus, histrio, rasor, anus—i.e. Every layman fancies himself a physician—priest, jew, monk, jack-pudding, barber, and dame.

If women particularly desire to cure something, I would propose to them besides souls,—for which they would be better soul-curesses than the soul-curers are—wounds; as in some Spanish provinces women remove the beard, so should they also legs and arms; their hands, so gentle, tender and apt, their keener survey of what is actually before them, and their compassionate hearts would certainly as sweetly heal common wounds as they make those of the heart. Many a soldier, if the female surgeon of his regiment were pretty, would boldly expose himself to wounds were it only to have them bound by her, or suffer his arm to be amputated by her in order to give her his hand. The blood-fearing eye of women would become sufficiently hardened, though not so flinty, as that of men; as the Parisian fish-women prove by wounds and blows. Moreover, at this present time the whole world is forming hardening-schools for the feelings,—I mean wars.

I will only add a page or two to my over-lengthy epistle and then break off. Although every mother plays the doctor, she yet constantly requires one for the child. Then she wants very many remedies, in order to try each only once, and so, in consequence, not at the wrong time. Then she requires many doctors, in order to hear and to say much. And many even think to instigate the doctor to a more active campaign against the malady by representing it as worse than it is, and concealing the favourable symptoms: as if a person should try to rescue himself from the danger of drowning by screaming fire, or from fire by the distress signals in use at sea.

Meanwhile, as no woman's mind will suffer itself to be deprived of a physicking finger along with the doctor's ring, nor of its brains as well as the doctor's hat, a man might, myself for instance, remove the chief danger of a domestic practice of medicine for the family circle by a few general rules, such, perhaps, as the following:—Grant in general, for instance, that most illnesses are asthenic or weakening—according to Brown above eight-ninths, to Schmidt the full nine-ninths; now, the younger the children are, the more asthenic are they, and so more likely to die from sudden loss of strength than from sudden over-stimulants; wherefore, in every case you may prescribe strengthening domestic remedies, that is to say nourishment, a tonic of the least injurious kind.

The heat of fever can only be allayed by what the child himself fancies; and still less must it be strengthened by medicines instead of nourishment; and least of all by food instead of drink. A few words on this point may be allowed even to the laity; the superior excellence of a glass of wine to all glasses of medicine in cases of weakness is seen in grown-up people, in whom, after all apothecary's essences, the electric spark of life has frequently been re-kindled by one strengthening bottle of wine,—of this I have experienced strangely decisive instances. And many things might easily be added to this; wine has the advantage of a longer, slower, and more constant influence; whereas the tonics of the apothecary assume the name of aquavitæ and act like earthquakes, that is to say, by small doses and long intervals.

I will give yet one other piece of good advice, the very best, to women; that is, when a child is really ill to do nothing whatever—especially nothing new—not to change a moderate temperature—to give him what he wishes to eat or drink—to say nothing if he fast for a few days—and to avoid all domestic recipes. A mistake in a domestic remedy, giving wine, for instance, instead of vinegar; or, in an opposite case, fruit instead of eggs, may just as easily be the cause of death as a mistake in a prescription. The only thing I would further recommend to the mother is Dr. Kilian's excellent 'Home and Travelling Physician,'—and that, not that she may attempt to cure by it, but that, after a physician has named the complaint, she may use a treatment in accordance with it. For the husband I should recommend Kilian's 'Clinical Handbook,' a new edition of the former work, enlarged and enriched with receipts. Both books will be sent for your perusal by the next carrier.

The gymnastic instruction of your Paul shall be discussed another time, in some six or seven years, when he shall be born and have attained that age. In any case I would, at least, let my own children, for weeks together, climb, leap, swim, run races, play at ball and nine pins; but I would also just as soon, for weeks together, let them dig like a burrowing mole, or be kept quiet like a person recovering from scarlet fever; and this not that they become well, but may continue well, and in a century given more to sitting than to speaking, may bring with them so much sitting faculty that they may not suffer penance on their bench every session. At least, I would exercise the strong in sitting as much as the weak in exercise. I would also rather set them to hard bodily labour in the evening than in the morning, and so cause physical exertion to follow, not precede, mental. Sitting and thinking after violent exercise is not nearly so healthy or agreeable as the reverse. Active exercise in the morning, as an excitement to the sluggish early pulse, along with the greater excitability experienced at that time, will frequently exhaust for the whole day. The leaps which boys practise on their way from school show the bent of nature. In spite of all these reasons I would yet do the opposite—not always, but yet occasionally, in order to inure the body to it.

I will now close my letter, which consists almost entirely of postscripts because I constantly intended to conclude and always went on. Fare you well, and your wife still better:
J. P. F. R.

P.S. If you should have purchased Dr. Marshall's 'Instructions for the care of Mothers, Children, &c. &c., in their peculiar illnesses,' third edition, two parts—be somewhat mistrustful and disobedient with regard to his instructions; or at least, let them be first filtered and refined by some Brownian physician. When, for instance, he orders a lying-in woman to have nothing during the first nine days but sour fruit, saltpetre and other weakening diets, he does just the same as if one were to lay a person apparently frozen to death, who can only be recovered by very gradual application of warmth beginning at the lowest possible degree, in an ice-house for a few days in order that he might recover gradually from the cold. Certainly he would do so slowly enough as he would scarcely become warm before the resurrection.

COMIC APPENDIX AND EPILOGUE TO THE FIRST VOLUME.

A DREAMED LETTER TO THE LATE PROFESSOR GELLERT, IN WHICH THE AUTHOR BEGS FOR A TUTOR.

SUFFER a dreamed letter to find its place here, for the recreation both of reader and writer. Few men have experienced so rational a kind of dreaming as I have done;—whereof more shall be said at some future time in a revision of my treatises: others must treasure up their rational waking thoughts. I was obliged, when awake, to help out this dream, even with some changes in its order, so that it might—by the system of opposite ends and aims, as well as of memory and oblivion—really appear what it is. For the rest, I hope I paid it sufficient heed; for, as soon as it was over, I employed the well-known art of recalling dreams by shutting the eyes and keeping every limb motionless. Unfortunately all the fancies or foundlings of a dream—the enfants perdus of the imagination, all the more truly because they usually carry us back to the days of our childhood, and so form a limbus infantum—have this great fault, that they shine brilliantly until we awake, but then little or nothing of them is to be found. At least, such is my case; and I hope the reader consents.

“Excellent departed Gellert! I want a tutor for my son Max: for I am at present engaged in writing on education, and consequently have not a spare minute to devote to the practice of it; just as Montesquieu found himself obliged to resign the office of president to devote himself to the ‘Spirit of Laws.’ Since at every university there are pedagogic engrossers and purveyors, and fewer subjects of instruction than accomplished instructors; and since, moreover, you, before your decease, exercised the patron’s right of appointing tutors, I did not know why you should not proceed in it still better now, not merely because you have marched forward with time, but also with eternity. In the extended acquaintance your immortal part must have formed on many planets—for as virtue in futurity is the reward of virtue, so also heavenly authorship will be the reward of earthly—you cannot fail to have ample choice of people and candidates in our system. Only you must not propose to me any tricked out, spurred dweller in Leipsig, of your time, clothed throughout in beautifying cement; no, not even the late Gellert himself (except as far as regards his loving gentleness and naïve cheerfulness): I want a very hard material—mind. There are, unavoidably, so many born harlequins, shall we also make educated ones, or both together; stamped pinchbeck pieces, crawling, cringing, worms?

“Heavens! how is it that I always find something good in books on education, and so seldom anything of it in teachers? What have I not seen of these last, Gellert, and yet may see in any town I please? I do not (because I will not)*think of those pceevish creatures full of child-hate, those living aversions to little ones—for manly justice makes even a false system of education good; and, to give an instance, nothing is so dangerous in icebergs as the clefts or chasms—but of those sickly-sweet, honey-dewed, sugar-of-lead perpetual teachers, who would consecrate every thing for the young, even the swaddling clothes, as a pope does those actually used. Oh! I perfectly understand that tutor: after every step and every leap of the young creature he will sow something; and, moreover be most anxious to know whether the mental cherry-stones, which he has brought him enveloped in their sweet covering, will grow and take root in his stomach as he hopes; or, to use another different living metaphor, whether the frog’s eggs he has given him in a draught of pond water are developing themselves. In physical matters, says he, the same thing is commoner but injurious and then he shortly alludes to the lessons in which he also teaches it.

“The tutor stands up for the U without which the child’s Q cannot be pronounced. ‘Let my sermon precede every action,' says he, 'the man, forsooth, must strengthen with many reasons every childish action of the child, and shave it with a scythe.'

"He who has seen such a man frequently, though not everywhere, has learned much. In China there is a law-book, and interpreters of it too, to teach the best method of drinking tea genteelly. But the above-mentioned man would wish the thing to be done improperly and properly also; because, indeed, he finds a very great want of directions for children how to take coffee, tea, tobacco, stones—for throwing; hands—for kissing; and cakes—for stealing. It is the same man who chinks up the Ten Commandments on the study door, as on a pillar of remembrance, so that the young may always have them before their eyes—which is precisely the best means of never seeing them. Most parental and tutorial commands resemble the inscription one sees on some doors—of 'shut the door' which cannot be read if he have left the door open.

"Observe from above a tutor who chains himself to his prisoners; who permits himself to be adopted as spiritual father—which the real father ought to be, since we can indeed give instruction to a stranger's child but education only to our own, because the one may know cessation, the other must proceed without interruption—Observe him and he must appear to you (even without the bird's eye perspective of another world) less in that serious light which is usual above than in a very different one; when, for instance, you see him take a walk with his auditory of slaves, endeavouring to turn every hill, and stream, and knot of people (in themselves nothing) into a medium of imparting instruction to his slaves. For as long as the child is awake he ceases not to develop him; although, perhaps, his dreams develop him much better. If every eastern pearl costs the life of a slave, every western pupil costs a teacher, and something more. The teacher, who cannot live to himself, suffers his pupil as little life to himself; and so they mutually impart to each other sins of weakness; somewhat as the new and the old world imparted to each other a new disease, that of the double small-pox.

"To speak in figures, departed friend, tutors and beggars mutilate children in order to feed themselves; only the former expose the distortions as curved lines of beauty, the latter as holes and chinks in their living alms' boxes.

"Or by their long polishing of the child they rub off its pure form; like those glass dishes in which curious specimens of glass are so laboriously piled that at last their original depth is positively diminished.

"But should this be, excellent immortal? Must my good Max, whose eye and hand aim at power, fall down so weakened and weary? Must, in short, a boy of the nineteenth century be blown out by his tutor so thin, and tender, and brittle, that he—like the man recorded by Lusitanus, who thought his seat was made of glass and therefore always remained on his legs—must regard everything about him as moral, æsthetic, intellectual glass, and so not venture to sit, to stand, or to lie—nay, not even to be? As was said above, dear friend, I chose to say this in a somewhat figurative style, because I wished to tread in your footsteps. But, like all imitators (I know that too well) I must retire with a longer nose and not much shorter ears; for your present figurative style (since in heaven or Uranus you are near the greatest objects and worlds—Jupiter and Hell—and have them to inspire you) must be totally different from any other, even your own mortal style, from which doubtless it is distinguished by bold oriental imagery; and you will say, even Gellert, naturalised in heaven, writes in some degree more wittily and instructively, and no one there speaks dully.—For the rest I know perfectly well, even to your very phrases, the objections you will make to me against the influence of tutorial glazing. For you will find an anecdote which you have read in Marville* applicable to the point. As an instance how accurately I can guess, I will myself relate it to you. 'A young gentleman, a preacher, with fine action, voice and so forth, mounted the pulpit and began his sermon; but lo! he had forgotten it, and knew, even less than before, what he had to say. However, he composed himself, raised his voice (and himself too, as he hoped by the action) and proclaimed to his audience, with rare energy, one conjunction after another—enfin, car, donc, si, or—and muttered with falling voice all kind of inaudible matter between the particles. The poorer parishioners were excited and in the highest degree attentive, yet without being able to understand much; and so they, naturally and reasonably, attributed their not hearing to the distance of their sittings from the pulpit, which one part of the congregation supposed too far off, and the other too near. And so this soul-curer, with his connecting, passionate and apostrophising words, preached about three-quarters of an hour, throwing himself and the pew occupiers into a fever and perspiration; then pronounced the Amen, and descended from the pulpit with the reputation of a true pulpit orator. The whole body of hearers resolved next time to choose their seats better; some to sit nearer, some farther off, so as not to lose a syllable.'

* Melange d'histoire de Vigneuel-Marville.

"Now what else do most teachers preach to children, and philosophers to the sons of muses and their readers, than a few thousand sis, doncs, curs, without any rational word attached?

"What else are most lessons to children—as most men's conversations to women—than customary marks to pay no attention?

"You now know what kind of a spiritual father I, the physical father, wish to adopt for my child. Naturally I only speak of the tutor's soul. His body may just as well be kneaded out of the earth of Uranus, Saturn, the moon or the sun, as out of the earth of this world. As to the soul, I wish that you would select such from among the candidates out of the present ten planets as you did formerly from those out of the ten German circles—which circles, dear Gellert, since your removal, have almost undergone ten persecutions of the Christians and metamorphoses of Vishnu—and then, out of this selection from the planets, choose one for me. You will spare me a subject out of the leaden, dull and heavy, selfish Saturn; who, with all his breadth of rings and abundance of moons, has wearisomely long years and gives a bad light; as well as a spring beetle out of that merry dancer round the sun, Mercury, the domestic Frenchman of the solar system, who always intoxicates himself in the sunshine and yet, when he really comes before the sun, only looks like a black spot. Excellent professor, you now know everything, and many things much earlier than we do; of which I only name to you Pallas, Ceres, Juno, and the planets discoverable in future. I will have no instructor out of Pallas—a morsel broken from the earth, and, moreover, at such a distance, for light and heat from the sun Apollo; I purposely mention this dwarf planet because your preference for Athens, whose protecting deity Pallas was, might perhaps influence you. You must be partial to nothing but the next world, and my first child.

“In one word, I do not know any distinguished star from which I would select my tutor but the morning and evening star; and so let it be, Gellert! Much might be said about that star—its double name, indeed, says two things—moreover it is named after the goddess of beauty; also after a certain light-bearer (Lucifer) not light-destroyer—especially the star possesses this excellent quality (and many others) that it occupies a very perfect position in the heaven, neither too far from the sun, nor too near the earth; and that (for children) it does not so strikingly wax and wane as the nearer moon. In short I consider Venus to be the best nurse. And so, I beg my tutor may come from Hesperus.

“For your son of Hesperus will certainly, I imagine, deal excellently with my child. He will—since liberality is in every case inestimable, and why not then in education in the first place—treat him with practical freedom and power, and not deprive him of his own. He will find little fault with what is childish. Quickly and perfectly apprehending what is outward, what inward, he will in no case make many words and vast preparations; will draw him on to what is great and universal, not to what is insignificant; will rather be the physician to his weakness, than the extinguisher of his strength. He will above all lend his aid to the child of earth; and shine before and behind him as his starry dwelling, Hesperus, does for the earth, and that only when the sun has not yet risen, or is already set; it is certain that so wise a Hesperid will not attempt to help the sun in the day time; I know him too well to suppose it possible.

“Even in physical matters he will not, with womanish anxiety, be perpetually fearful lest the child should break his leg against every twig—though, indeed, the breaking of a leg is better than the dread of it; and, on the other hand, children are themselves careful, owing to the novelty of all their experiments and the natural magnifying of a place where they may fall, caused by the shortness of their own bodies—or lest he should be poisoned by tin soldiers and children’s trumpets; or hurt by a rocking-horse; or spoiled by wearing trowsers. He who is so fearful for others may himself be suspected of fear; and a coward makes a coward, as a hermit does a hermit. Our ancestors, old Gollert, grew up sufficiently strong and modest with all their trowsers, feather beds, saddles and spices.

“It would on another account be particularly agreeable to me that you choose my tutor out of Venus; because there, according to the best telescopes and astronomers, may be found the loftiest mountains, compared with which our Chimborazzo were but a mole-hill—and so the purest mountain air is near the hottest sultriness of the valley; (I can readily picture to myself the heat of Lucifer or Venus). What a powerful, manly Alpine breast, joined to an Italy in the heart, must the inhabitant of Phosphorus bring to me at Baireuth, in the capacity of a right carefully selected tutor; who must resemble a general full of contrasting powers, of irrevocable strictness and order, sincere friendship, good fellowship, and persuasiveness.

“I am convinced my tutor will understand me when I say, that as the man can do without the scholar, but not the scholar without the man, I pray you above all things to ingraft the scholar upon the man, but not the reverse. Our nineteenth century, (I might thus speak to him more distinctly in the evening under the warm rain of punch,) whatever century you may reckon on your little planet, will not be the best, at least not the strongest, although it may, like yours, deserve the names of Phosphorus and Lucifer. What we magnify ourselves about is the French Revolution; or the changes of something little. The stones which the giants formerly hurled became islands; now, when islands are hurled, there come but stones, tombstones and grindstones. The Revolution, like an earthquake, put some motion into the skeletons of a charnel house. Tutors, like the anatomist Walther in Berlin, seek their glory in preparing skeletons by removing the flesh, and then bleaching them. Brother-dwellers on Venus, or rather on this earth, could you think so? Then should I repent writing to Gellert! To impart strength, and to leave strength will, I hope, be your first and last words in education. What is educated for the age will be worse than the age. The Hesperid answers me: 'In the springtime of childhood, fathers often look forward as far as the distant snow-white mountain peaks, and point out the winter to the spring. Far better the wind-fall of a spring storm, than the snow-fall of age.' As true as beautiful, candidate! I reply. Lavoisier made an instrument of ice into a calorimetre, or measurer of heat; thus fire is often measured by ice; the boy by the grey-headed man.

"The candidate will animadvert on much in the conversational style of his paymaster; but I go on little affected by his remarks; 'Howsoever I may express myself, it is certain that the artistic, compound-fractured style, into which writing masters and tutors would break the souls of their pupils, like letters, is in nothing different from the compound fractures of surgeons, except in the case of wit, which truly requires variety in order to find without restraint distant resemblances.' The candidate replies: 'If only to the innate energy of a child the sap of life and room for its development be afforded, there will be no need to graft on every branch, to cut the leaves, or paint the flowers; one must, like a king, direct the whole, but not interfere with the individual parts.'

"I exclaim, 'You are the man for me, (if not, indeed, more than a man!) If the tutor's situations which I once filled were yet vacant you should be my vicar in them—but you shall be so in the last, in the one I overlook and present to as father and patron. The easy conditions need scarcely be mentioned. You are not to torment the child with a thousand languages—for merely to learn languages is to throw away one's money in buying beautiful purses, or to learn the Lord's Prayer in all languages without ever praying it.'

" 'I agree, with all my heart!' said he boldly. 'So you will only teach him French, English, Spanish, Italian;—Greek, Latin, and German, of course—but the last most thoroughly. As regards the sciences, the child will be fed by you, as its young are by the house swallow, only on the wing—not attached to any long appointment of the hours of study.'

" 'You know the human heart, and show a most beautiful one,' interrupted he, and drank. 'But when your usual eight hours of study are over, and the child or you testify any further desire of study, you may, without hesitation, take as much from the second or from the last third of the day as you choose, and teach during the whole of it. Now in what appertains to science itself (for the arts of dancing, fencing, swimming, riding, leaping, singing, playing on the violin, the horn, and the piano, will be recreations for both of you), it will satisfy me if the poor child only learn history—namely, as much of the past as is already gone; and also I would wish that, along with the most recent, a little of the piquante future should be insinuated, together with other not less necessary histories: those of nature, of books, of heretics, of gods, of church history, &c.—in the same way a few of the most necessary branches of knowledge—knowledge of the stars, of coins, of antiquity, of heraldry, &c.; and the doctrines of natural science, of jurisprudence, of medicine, of nobility, of morality, &c.; and the descriptions—as descriptions of the earth, &c., a few ics, as aesthetics, dietetics, phelloplastics, &c.; for, say I perpetually, why the devil should a poor, unbearded, thin-skulled child be immeasurably laden with learned fat and refuse? Why should his life be interwoven, not with fair white leaves, but with whole full books? And he himself become a pack and baggage-bearing Pegasus? Wherefore this, say I?'

" 'You have to do, and can do, much; for you are a few thousand tutors in one. Frequently I cannot at all understand why a whole regiment of tutors and governesses is not engaged at once; especially when I consider how many demigods and goddesses the Romans ascribed to children and worshipped; for instance, Nascio, or Natio, presiding over the birth—Rumina over suckling—Edusa over eating—Potina over drinking—Levana, moreover—Statilinus and Statana over the standing of both sexes—Fabulinus over speaking—I purposely omit, from detestation of prolixity in others, many half divinities, such as Vagitans, Ossitago, Nundina, Paventia, Carne.* Could one so arrange it, and pay, one should appoint a distinct teacher for almost every faculty, who should direct that only; yea, and even teachers for the various subdivisions of the same faculty were at least pious wishes. I could like (but nothing will come of it) if I possessed that army of various teachers, to have a son exercised, say in æsthetics, according to the different divisions of Krug; one teacher instructing him in that author's Hypseology, another in his Kalleology, a third in his Krinatology; and so the child might at one time have his sublime tutor, at another his feeble, at another his naïve. I would also wish, dear friend, that, in the virtues, you should prescribe special private exercises and instructions in each virtue, so that they might not all run into one another and the poor child stand there like a stupid angel, who knows neither right nor left, but only what is right. If Franklin schooled and exercised himself each week in a different virtue, might not the various Sundays and festivals, which as holydays can be used for little real instruction, be applied to the inculcation of many virtues? On every festival might be taken a new one: on three holydays the three parts of repentance; and on every Apostle's day some fault might be eradicated. I can, indeed, picture to myself a long feast of the Trinity, in which one might, hour by hour, allow the child to go through all the virtues, so that at the prayer-bell he might be presented as a saint of a month, or holy image.

“Moreover, so excellent a tutor for my child might rest assured that, were the good Gellert still living, I would with pleasure, at the end of his engagement (when Max would no longer require him) and with all the influence which I, as an author, might possess with Gellert, give him recommendations to him, in order, that he might further recommend the young man; and so provide for him according to his merits."

* Augustine, de Civit. Dei, i. 4 & 9.

At this point I awoke; wanted to know what I had dreamed; and tried to recall it. But I soon found that, out of my dreamed letter to Gellert—quite in accordance with the mad order of a dream—I had fallen into a new conversation with a teacher who was there sitting before me. Meanwhile such a conclusion may be in so far good, as, should I print it, it will serve to prove that I have not, as is, alas! very usual, dreamed in sport, and for the sake of publishing, but in very deed and truth.

FOURTH FRAGMENT.

ON FEMALE EDUCATION.

CHAP. I. Jacquelina's Confession of her Education, § 73—75. CHAP. II. Destination of Women less for their Husbands than for their Children, § 76—78. CHAP. III. Nature of Women, Proof of their predominating Purity of Heart, § 79—86. CHAP. IV. Education of Girls in regard to Reasonableness, § 87, 88; to Purity of Heart and Love of their own Sex, § 89; to Gentleness, and the Tendency to Female Passionateness, § 90; to Economy of Living, and Domestic Affairs, § 91—93; to Knowledge and Skill, § 94, 95; to Dress, Ornament, &c., § 96; to Cheerfulness, § 97; Education of Girls endowed with Genius, § 98. CHAP. V. Private Instructions of a Prince to the head Governess of his Daughter, § 9

CHAPTER I.

§ 73.

UNDER female education I understand three things at once, which are in themselves contradictory; first, the education which women generally give; second, their peculiar call to a right education as compared with men; third, the education of girls.

The first and second would have required an earlier consideration if the characteristics of the female sex, according to which its education should be regulated, were not united in them both; and, especially, if in this little experimental work it were necessary to arrange the position of its matter in very strict order. A reader, to whom so many systems are presented must hold his way armed with a predetermined one, unless each is to occupy his mind in turn.

§ 74.

Ill-educated and ill-educating states, as well as fathers immersed in business, can only trust the welfare of education to mothers, as the second chapter shall show ; but the evil that mothers might obviate can be easily stated in this paragraph. Were it in other respects accordant with the tone of this work, I willingly confess that I would offer to the world in a merrier manner this little register of sins, or list of losses in gaming, and debts of honour ; and the more so because, in this very case, a certain, otherwise excellent, mother of five children, Madame Jacquelina, luckily turning over the pages of my Levana, offered to give me an airy embodiment of it. Ladies love to dress, undress, and redress. For as I had known my excellent friend a long time, much was prepared and made easy ; and I could well imagine that the fair Jacquelina, as sister-orator for her whole sex—though without any other commission to show than her beauty—would stand before my writing desk, as though it were a confessional, and declare she heartily desired to be absolved by me ; only, for very shame's sake, it was impossible for her to make an auricular confession, but she would take it very kindly if I would regard her as a deaf person—after the fashion of former confessors who pronounced the confession of their fair deaf and dumb penitents over them—and so, as her representative and spiritual father, make the following confession for her :—

§ 75.

“Honourable and dear sir!” (I was thus to put the address to me into her own mouth lest the joke should be continued) “I confess before God and yourself that I am a poor pedagogic sinner, and have broken many commands of Rousseau and of Campe. I confess that I never truly carried out any one principle for a month, but only for an hour or two ; that I have often, half with thought, and so half without thought, forbidden my children to do something, without afterwards observing whether they did it or not; that I never could deny them anything, when both they and I were floating in the midst of a sea of happiness, which else from calm reason I should have at once refused; and that precisely at two seasons, the most sunshiny and the most cloudy, whether of myself or of the children, did I spoil them most. Have I not even done still worse? Have I not, when strangers were present, said to my Bella, as well as to my pet (I mean by that only my poodle) Faites la belle!

“Have I not, at each of our great fairs, given holydays on account of strangers’ visits, especially those of eminent frequenters of the fair to my husband, and thus valued a visitor more highly than five children; so that I very little resembled that German woman, of whom my husband read in the twelfth volume of the mental Fama, who had the courage to decline dancing with two kings on the same evening because she considered it to be unchristian? And during all last year did I not see my two youngest children, Josephine and Peter, only once a day, at breakfast, and that merely because I wanted to finish a novel and a piece of worsted-work; and, also, because my noble friend, the princess, for whom I was working it, had taken up her residence here? Only this consideration can tranquillise my conscience, that I took the greatest trouble to procure a trustworthy nurse for my little ones, who promised me to treat them as a real mother; and may Heaven punish her if she was ever inattentive to so dear a trust, or ever let my precious lambs go out of her sight for a moment, or ever left them in the hands of strangers! Ah, God! when I think of the possibility of such a thing! But, alas! what do such creatures know of the anxieties of a tender mother’s heart?

“At other times, I have indeed (and that consoles me) always allowed all my children to come to me twice a day, after breakfast and after dinner, and have then often for hours fondled and taught them. But I confess that my impetuosity would never let me be satisfied to kiss them in moderation; and so I drew on me my husband’s blame, who dislikes that exceedingly and says, ‘Children (even if not my own) may, with the Princess of Condé, lament that their misfortune is to be loved by old people—the holy seal of the heart, a kiss, is to children an empty, meaningless thing; a very energetic one may even be painful, and perhaps injurious, to the fifth pair of nerves in the lips—a gentle stroking of the head is better, and a gentle loving word, a kiss which they give, and a softer one which they receive.’

“I confess that, as in the game of forfeits, when I asked myself, What shall this forfeit (that of love) which I hold in my hand do? I always answered, Love me immeasurably. Whereby, because I required so many marks of love, I have made Josephine too sensitive, Sophia hypocritical, and Peter ill-tempered. After any severe punishment I inflicted instead of allowing the whole of my former love to glow warmly on them, (a striking change, which my husband says is the only means of correcting and reconciling a child, during at least the first eight or ten years,) I suffered the long cloud of after-wrath to hang over them; as if their young hearts could trace hidden love, or suffer for it long, or, in the best case, not learn to imitate that sulkiness.

“I confess that, though not in the least nervous at whatever may happen out of the house, I yet never could be tranquil with my dear children, although I knew that the least impetuosity, were it even of a hasty running to their assistance, is injurious, and has a tendency to produce a similar disposition in them. And I confess that I show anger too soon, even towards my maid-servants, in spite of my knowing perfectly what my husband so beautifully says that to give way to an angry expression of countenance, or of voice, before even the youngest children, is in fact to teach them anger. For, as the whole soul is imprisoned and moulded into the whole body, it follows that every mental is connected with some physical part, and thus these mutually excite each other—the outward expression of passion produces the mental emotion, and so of the reverse.

“My husband asserted and, moreover, carried out the principle, that a husband can never so well establish a normal school for female teachers (like a good wife, I use his very expressions) as during the first year after marriage; in this time, he thought, a wife might be mentally enriched with every kind of manly instruction, which, should she afterwards neglect, she would yet seek and cherish for the love of her first child, and of him who is even before the first, her husband; for at an after period, continued he, somewhat of that glowing love-service towards the husband, and somewhat, also, of that anxious solicitude about the children, vanishes; and so, still continued he, the education of many children does not proceed better, at least, not more carefully. But I rejoice that I have confuted him in this, as in many other things, and that I brought up my third child, even while expecting the fourth, for several months precisely as my wedded lord and school-master directed during the school-weeks of the honeymoon.

"But, venerable father, you certainly do not know by experience what whims husbands take some nine or ten months after marriage! Did not mine positively, seriously desire, that when I occasionally washed the little thing, I would not rub its face and wipe it quickly up and down; because, said he, this kind of violence is disagreeable to them and excites their passion; but that I would softly glide from above downwards, and then gently round? What ridiculous pedantry! Surely a woman must know how to wash! So I go on just as usual, and care not how loudly both little and big cry out against it.

"For the rest I confess, and would willingly do penance for it, that I am never so soon angry as when dressing, or engaged in any other important business; the beautiful, perfect repose of my education then vanishes. My husband wants to place, for penance 'and the removal of my angry wrinkles, a magnifying glass beside my toilet glass; but, thank God! I do not yet need such a glass of detraction; and, besides, my features are less changed than my colour. Perhaps I am excusable for admitting my three eldest girls (and Lucy, too, often) to my toilet, because in the first place, they watch me so gladly, and are so quiet (especially when I tell them that they may perhaps go with me), and because, secondly, a young girl's eye is best exercised in taste with regard to matters of dress on the costume of a grown-up person.

"It consoles me, however, to reflect that I never purchased a handsome new article of dress, either for myself or my daughters, without labouring to repress the love of finery, by telling them how little a woman's worth depends on dress, and that a rich habit is only chosen because thereby alone can rank be shown. At the same time I must confess that all my daughters are vain: however many sermons I make to them during my toilet, I am not listened to but only looked at. How often do I turn round with reproaches when my really beautiful Maximiliana stands behind me peeping into the glass and say, 'There, again, a pretty, rosy, blue-eyed mask is looking at herself, and can never be tired of peeping and staring!'

"I farther confess, worthy sir, that I was certainly infinitely more displeased with Peter when he lately threw Veritas (really a most exquisite ideal figure from Bertuch's repository of arts) out of the window, than if he had told ten lies; on the other hand, I hope I remain perfectly tranquil when my husband sometimes makes such an uproar about some little fibs or other the children may have been telling; or about their frequently quite justifiable scoldings of the servants: then, says he, reflecting on my anger, 'The Romans did wisely when they wrote the initial letter of the word signifying man inverted to indicate woman.'

"If God will only forgive me the sins wherein I meant well, I shall be satisfied to be punished for the rest. I certainly have sinned much, and deserved temporal punishments and bad children. I will, however, from this time forth amend my educational life and become better and better; and I entreat you, reverend, dear sir, to forgive me my sins in God's stead." In which case I should certainly lay my hand on Jacqueline's round white shoulder, and readily absolve her past, though truly not her future, sins.

§ 76.

But the seriousness of the subject demands that a

SECOND CHAPTER,

ON THE DESTINATION OF THE FEMALE SEX,

SHOULD restore to it its due honour. A father, who only sees and educates his children for an hour or two, must be careful not to require his own hour's strict attention and persistency from the mother who wearies herself with them all day long. This longer companionship excuses much maternal overflowing, both of love and anger. In the same way, a stranger always considers parental displeasure too severe, because he sees the fault for the first time and isolated, which the parents behold for the thousandth time, and in an ever-strengthening chain of habit. Mothers readily acquire an over-estimation of their children because, placed sufficiently near the development of their minds to count every new leaf, they regard each universal human growth as a particular individual one, and thence infer some few miracles. And then how much must the physical care of the children, which in the middle classes entirely devolves on the mother, weary and deaden her—as compared with the independent father—for their mental culture.

§ 77

The education of the first half of the first decade of life is already placed in the hands of the mother, owing to the necessities of the body. His avocations in the state, in his profession, or business, only grant the father intervals, and those, rather for instruction than education—two happy classes of fathers alone excepted. The first is a country gentleman, who reposes in such a golden mean of all circumstances that he converts his mansion into a benevolent institution for his children, if he love his successors better than cards, and hares, and rents. The second is the man whom he appoints—a country clergyman. The six days' leisure, the country's separation from the turmoil of towns, the open air, the office, which is itself a higher educational institution, and, finally, the seventh day, which presents their physical father to his children on a glorifying elevation as a holy and spiritual father, and impresses an official seal on the lessons of the week—all these things open to the minister a sphere of education into which he may attract other children; since he may always better convert his parsonage into a school-house than a tutor's study into a parish. I would rather trust my son to a clergyman than to a tutor; because he is freer, and stands on his legs, not upon crutches.

In the middle ranks the men educate best, because the women are little cultivated: in the higher classes, generally, the women, because there they are more carefully brought up than the men. What, now, can the man do? a philosopher, we will suppose, or a minister of public affairs, a soldier, a president, poet, or artist?

In the very first instance he must love and recompense his wife better, in order that she, by double support, the love of her children and the love of her husband, may more easily carry out the most difficult part of education—the first. In this way the husband may bestow care and attention on the first and most important education, that given by the mother, which no after tutors, schools, or paternal praise and blame, can ever replace; that is to say, he will exercise the law-giving power of education, the mother the administrative. Let the husband only continue to be the lover of his wife and she will listen to what he says about education, at least of the mind. How readily will a noble-minded marriageable girl, or a bride, surveying from afar her future work, listen to the educational rules which even a youth gives! And, when married, a woman willingly adopts many a good suggestion about the education of her children which a stranger offers. Only by the union of manly energy and decision with womanly gentleness does the child rest and sail as at the conflux of two streams; or, in another figure, the sun raises the tide and so does the moon, but he raises it only one foot, she three, and both united four. The husband only marks full stops in the child's life, the wife commas and semicolons, and both more frequently. One might exclaim, "Mothers, be fathers!" and "Fathers, be mothers!" for the two sexes perfect the human race, as Mars and Venus gave birth to Harmony. The man works by exciting powers; the woman by maintaining order and harmony among them. The man, in whom the state, or his own genius, destroys the balance of powers for the advantage of one, will always bring this overlaying influence to education: the soldier will educate warlike; the poet poetically; the divine piously; the mother only will educate humanly. For only the woman needs to develop nothing in herself but the pure human being; as in an Æolian harp no string predominates over the rest, but the melody of its tones proceeds from unison and returns to it.

§ 78.

But you mothers, and especially you in the higher and less busy classes, whose fortune spares you the heavy burden of careful housekeeping, and surrounds you with a cheerful green garden for the education of your children, how is it that you can prefer the tedium of solitude and of society to the enduring charms of your children's love—to the drama of their fair development—to the sports of the best beloved beings—to the reward of the most delightful and lasting influence? That woman is despicable who, having children, ever feels ennui. Well formed nations have been, according to Herder, the educators of the human race; so let your beauty be, not merely the external garment, but the very instrument of instruction and education. Towns and countries have female names, and are represented as females; and, in truth, the mothers who educate for the future the first five years of their children's lives do found cities and countries. Who can replace a mother? Not even a father. For she, attached to the child by the daily and nightly bonds of care for its physical wants, can and must weave and embroider mental instruction in glittering characters on those tender ties. Will you, then, neglect the fairest time for working purely and deeply on posterity, since the stronger sex and the state will soon step in, and bring pulleys and grappling irons instead of your leading strings and gently raising levers, and therewith move them harshly and roughly? Dost thou, royal mother, consider it nobler to guide the intrigues of a cabinet than the little future heir-apparent? Thou hast borne him within thee, when a heavier burden, and hast suffered acutest pain when he was taken from thee, and this only for his physical life; and wilt thou shun to undertake something less than both these, whereby thou mayest draw a holy spiritual glory around thy victory? How often are your night watches recompensed by a child's coffin; but your day watches over his mind ever by rich daily rewards! If you once believe that everything depends on education, what name do you deserve when, precisely as your position is high, you intrust the education of your children to persons of lower rank; and while the children of the middle classes have their parents, those of the higher classes have only nurses and maids, as the directors of their path in life?

The whole ancient world elevates maternal above paternal love; and the mother's must be great indeed, for a loving father cannot even picture to himself any love greater than his own; why, then, are you, compared with the fathers, who are so anxious about education and who even write great books upon the subject, so indifferent about its application? For your lover you can freely give wealth and health; why not then spare a few hours for the little helpless creature you love? For the one you overcome opinions and inclinations; why should you do less for the other? You, on whose physically and spiritually nourishing bosom Nature has cast the orphans of the earth, will you let them fade and die on a cold hired breast? You, who are provided by nature with patience, grace, gentleness, eloquence and love for the beings who fly to you even from their father, can you not watch over them? I do not mean during the night, but only during the day. See! they who once rested beneath your heart, and have now no longer a place in it, stretch their little arms towards her who is most related to them, and beg again for nourishment. As in many ancient nations no request was denied to a woman holding a child in her arms, so now do children, lying in your arms; or in their nurse's, offer up petitions for themselves.

It is true that the sacrifices you make for the world will be little known by it—men govern and earn the glory; and the thousand watchful nights and sacrifices by which a mother purchases a hero, or a poet, for the state are forgotten, not once counted; for the mothers themselves do not count them; and so, one century after another, do mothers, unnamed and unthanked, send forth the arrows, the suns, the storm-birds, and the nightingales of time! But seldom does a Cornelia find a Plutarch who connects her name with the Gracchi. But as those two sons who bore their mother to the temple of Delphi were rewarded by death, so your guidance of your children will only find its perfect recompense at the termination of life.

Twice, however, you will not be forgotten. If you believe in an invisible world in which the glad tears of a thankful heart are more valued and shine more brightly than worldly crowns set round with the petrified tears of sorrow; if you believe this, you know your future! And, if you have educated rightly, your child knows you. Never, never has one forgotten his pure, right-educating mother. On the blue mountains of our dim childhood, towards which we ever turn and look, stand the mothers who marked out to us from thence our life; the most blessed age must be forgotten ere we can forget the warmest heart. You wish, O women! to be ardently loved, and for ever, even till death. Be, then, the mothers of your children. But you mothers who do not educate your children, how should your thanklessness for an unmerited blessing cause you to hang down your head in shame before every childless mother, every childless wife, and blush because one worthy woman sighs after that heaven which you have abandoned like a fallen angel. Oh! why does fate, which often for some century's blood-hood gives a million souls to the rack, deny to the most lovely gentle being the bliss of one child's heart? Why must Love long for an object, and Hate, not? Ah! Ernestina,* how wouldst thou have loved and made happy! But thou wast not permitted: the death-cloud carried thee away with all the roses of thy youth, and thy warm mother's heart was called, childless, into the unknown world of spirits. Oh! how wouldst thou have loved and educated with thy clearness of perception, thy strength of character, thy ever-flowing spring of love, thy self-sacrificing soul—thou, who wert adorned with all the virtues of an ancient German woman!

* The excellent lady to whom the poet here pens so fine a memorial was his wife's younger sister, Ernestina Augusta Philippina Mahl.

CHAPTER III.

NATURE OF GIRLS.

§ 79.

THE education of daughters is the first and most important business of mothers; because it may be uninterrupted, and continue till the daughter's hand glides straight from the mother's into that which holds the wedding ring. The boy is educated by a many-toned world, school-classes, universities, travels, business, and libraries; the mother's mind educates the daughter. For that reason he is more independent of the shocks of foreign influence than his sister; for outward contradiction compels him to an inner balancing unity, whereas one little corner of the world easily appears a whole quarter, nay, a whole world, to the maiden.

Before we speak of the education of the sex, we must first determine its character. According to well-known principles the nature of men is more epic, and formed for reflection; that of women more lyrical, and endowed with feeling. Campe truly remarks that the French have all the failings and perfections of children—hence, I believe, they gladly call themselves Athenians, whom the old mann, of Leipsig. She died, Feb. 18, 1805, in the twenty-sixth year of her age. The desire to press a child to her heart occupied the last moments before her death. She was one of the noblest beings that ever lived.—TRANS.

Egyptian priest found at once very childlike and very childish. I have discussed more at large in other places the great resemblance between the character of the French nation and that of women. From these two assertions, at least from the more flattering, a third would follow, the resemblance between women and children. The same unbroken unity of nature—the same clear perception and understanding of the present—the same sharpness of wit—the keen spirit of observation—ardour and quietness—excitability and easily raised emotions—the ready, quick passage from the inward to the outward, and, conversely, from gods to ribbons, from motes in the sunbeam to solar systems—the admiration of forms and colours, and excitability carry out, by a mental alliance, the physical alliance of the two beings. Hence, to use an appropriate simile, children are in the first instance dressed in women's habits.

He who loves antitheses of the newest fashion might call women antique, Grecian, or even Oriental beings; men, on the contrary, modern, northern, European; those poetical, these philosophical. A man possesses, as it were, two selfs; a woman but one, and needs another to see her own. From this female incapacity for holding dialogues with self may be explained most of the advantages and disadvantages of woman's nature. And so, because their near echo readily becomes a resonance and confused with the original sound, they can neither poetically nor philosophically separate and re-unite their component parts, and are more truly poetry and philosophy than poets and philosophers. Women show more taste in dressing others than themselves; and, precisely because it is the same with their bodies as with their hearts, they can read in those of others better than in their own.

§ 80.

Let us illustrate in various ways the unity and sincerity of woman's nature. Because in her no power predominates and all her powers are rather receptive than formative; because she, true mirror of the versatile present, accompanies every external by an internal change; even because of these things does she seem to us so enigmatic. To guess what her soul is, means to guess her physical and other external relations; hence, the man of the world loves her as well and names her after those long, thin wine-glasses, called impossibles, because they cannot be emptied how high soever you raise them.

Like the piano-forte, we might call her pianissimo-fortissimo, so accurately and strongly does she reflect the extremes of accident; at the same time, and for this very reason, her natural position must be one of repose and equal balance, like Vesta, whose holy fire none but women tended, and which everywhere, in town, temple, or private room, took, by law, the middle place.

Passion drives the man, passions the woman; him a stream, her the winds: he declares some one power to be monarchic, and suffers himself to be ruled by it; she, more democratic, lets the passing moment rule. The man is more frequently serious; the woman, for the most part, either blessed or cursed, joyful or sorrowful; which does not contradict our former praise of her measured tranquil constitution; for cheerfulness dwells all day with one woman, sadness with another; it is only passion that hurls both headlong.

§ 81.

Love is the life-spirit of her spirit; her spirit the law, the motive-spring of her nerves. How deeply she can love without cause and without return, even if not perceived in her love of children, may be remarked in her dislikes, which prey on her as strongly and unreasonably as her love animates. Like the Otaheitans, who are so gentle and childlike and yet eat their enemies alive, these delicate creatures have a similar appetite, at least for their female foes. They often yoke doves to a thunder car. The somewhat shrewish Juno demanded, and obtained, from antiquity gentle lambs as her favourite sacrifice. Women love, and that infinitely and truly; the most enthusiastic mystics were women; it was no man but a nun who died of longing love to Jesus. But it was only a man, and no woman, who could demand from the Stoic sage indifference to friendship. Nature sent women into the world with this bridal dower of love, not, as men often think, that they may altogether and entirely love them from the crown of their head to the sole of their feet, but for this reason—that they might be, what their vocation is,* mothers, and love children, to whom sacrifices must ever be offered and from whom none are to be obtained.

Woman, in accordance with her unbroken clear-seeing nature, loses herself and what she has of heart and happiness in the object she loves. The present only exists to her; and this present, again, is a determinate one, it is one, and only one, human being. As Swift loved not the human race, but only individuals belonging to it, so women, though they have the warmest hearts, are no citizens of the world, scarcely citizens of a town or a village, but only of their home; no woman can at the same time love the four quarters of the world and her own child, but a man can. He loves the idea; she the manifestation, that which alone is; as God—if this bold figure be not too bold—has only one loved object—His Universe. This peculiarity is seen in many other ways. Men love things best; for instance, truths, possessions, countries: women love persons best: the former, it is true, readily personify what they love. Just as what is the goddess of wisdom to a man, to a woman easily becomes a man who has wisdom. Even when a child, a woman loves a mock-human being—a doll, and works for it; the boy gets hold of a wooden horse and a troop of tin soldiers, and works with them. It probably arises from this very fact, that among boys and girls, sent at the same age to school, though the latter mature sooner they yet retain their play-persons longer than boys do their play-things. When, however, grown-up women of the lower classes look intensely after a beautiful doll, carried by a child in the higher ranks of life, it seems their love of dress may exceed their love of children. Further, girls kiss one another more frequently than boys; those look at the rider, these at the horse; those inquire about appearances, these about their causes; those about children, these about animals.

* See § 83.

§ 82.

The more corrupt a century, the more contempt is there in it for women. The more slavery in the form, or formlessness, of government, the more do they become the handmaidens of servants. In old free Germany women were considered sacred, and, like their images, the doves of Jupiter at Dodona, pronounced oracles; in Sparta and England, and in the fair age of chivalry, women bore the order-jewels of man's reverence. Now, since women rise and fall, become noble or base, according to the form of government—and this is constantly created and maintained by men—it is clear that women, after the character of men is formed, imitate that model: that there must first be seducing men before seduced women; that every deterioration of the female character is but the after-winter of a similar one in men. Place moral heroes in the field, and heroines follow them as brides; but the opposite does not hold true; no heroine can create a hero through love of her, but she may give birth to one. Therefore, all the more contemptible is the narrow-minded, squeamish Parisian man who makes tirades against the Parisian women, and, consequently, against all women, while he only ingrafts on them his own old sins, and poisons their womanhood by his own womanishness. How would such a plaster-cast creature of the age stand and tremble and wither away before a Spartan or an ancient German woman!

Consequently the present age, in complaining of female sensuality, admits the previous existence of the sin in men. Meanwhile let the devil's advocates stand forth against women, and those of holiness for them, and to the advantage of women. There are many satirical creatures who get something printed, and are viewed with wonder, and written up by German critics as men deeply read in human nature for no other reason than this: because, without any further pretension to knowledge of the world, insight, heart, or mind, they have converted every woman into nothing more than a fifth or sixth sense, and all their own desires into one overlaying one: and then especially the critic (he's a school-teacher!) thanks God and the author that now, for a few pence, which he does not pay but receive as a reward for his favour, he at last holds in his hand the key of the French and allied female castle.

These denouncers of women are, at all events, only half right, and certainly half wrong; the former when they speak of physiological, the latter when of moral, sensuality. Of the former—when without the concurrence of a perfectly innocent heart—no one is guilty but God the Father; and just as well might the greater beauty of a woman's bosom be attributed to her as a sin and excess. But, if Heaven created her especially for children, it is manifest that this physiological sensuality was ordained by the great Father of all children for the advantage of the growing after-world. The first dwelling which man inhabits is an organised one; and can this be too rich, too strong for his first original formation? Can want of power and life ever form an organic creature full of power and life. And which moment is the most important in the whole life? Certainly not the last, as theologians have often stated; but probably the first, as physicians show.

On the other hand, there is allotted, as a counterpoise to the senses of woman a purer heart than that of man, which makes common cause with them; and thus the accusation of her physical conformation closes with an eulogy on her spiritual nature. But these good beings do not defend themselves save by proxy; and it is probable that, with their facility of belief, mistrustful words may at last turn their watchfulness away from their inward heart; just as many lose their religion, or their religious sentiments, without knowing how, merely because they hear discussions, and nothing else, about it.

§ 83.

Nature has directly formed woman to be a mother, only indirectly to be a wife; man, on the contrary, is rather made to be a husband than a father. It were, indeed, somewhat strange if the stronger sex must lean on the weaker, the flower support its stem, the ivy the tree; nevertheless he, just because he is the stronger, does enforce something of that kind, makes his wife into the bearer of his arms and burdens, his marketer and provision cooker; and the husband regards the wife as the barn and outer shed of his household goods. He is far more created for her than she for him: she is for physical what he is for mental posterity. Fleets and armies prove the dispensableness of women; on the contrary, societies for women, convents for instance, do not arise without some male directing lever as primum mobile. Nature, which moves on kindly, yet cruelly, towards her vast ends in the world, has, for this purpose, armed women—the colleges and training houses of posterity—mentally and physically with power of giving and power of denying: both their physical and mental charms and weaknesses afford them protection. Hence arise regard and attention to their persons, with which their souls are more intimately united into one existence than ours; hence their dread of wounds, because these affect a double life, and their indifference to sickness; whereas men fear wounds less than illnesses, because those affect the body most, these the mind. Connected with these are her temperance, her love of cleanliness, and also her modesty and her inclination to housewifery and quietness. The moral and apprehensive nature of girls is more rapidly developed than the mind of boys (as, according to Zach, satellites move quicker than planets; or, as flowers in valleys bloom sooner than on mountains;) because to the physical, and, consequently, maternal, maturity of fifteen, nature has also added that of the mind. So soon as the luxuriant flower has, with its pollen, provided for another spring, Nature harshly destroys its attractive colours, and leaves it to its mental treasures and harvest. On the contrary, she preserves man's body, which has to serve on a longer journey of action and thought, active into the vale of years, and far beyond the season of woman's bloom.

We may here subjoin this remark, drawn from the animal kingdom, that the male shows his greatest courage and power in the love-season, but the female after having given birth to her offspring.

It is easy to draw out these assertions into the lesser matters of detail; for instance, female avarice, which saves not for self but for her children; love of trifles; love of talking; the gentle voice, and many things which we blame.

§ 84.

We return to the former complaints about women. But why do men use this word so often about those beings to whom they owe the first thanks for existence, and who are sacrificed by Nature herself that life may follow life? Why are the treasure-houses of humanity, its creators under God, not esteemed more highly; and why do they only receive the wreath of corn ears to carry because it is prickly? Were there only one father on the earth we should worship him; but were there only one mother we should reverence and love her as well as worship.

The noblest and fairest quality with which nature could and must furnish women for the benefit of posterity was love, the most ardent, yet without return, and for an object unlike itself. The child receives love, and kisses, and night-watchings, but at first it only answers with rebuffs; and the weak creature which requires most pays least. But the mother gives unceasingly; yea, her love only becomes greater with the necessity and thanklessness of the recipient, and she feels the greatest for the most feeble, as the father for the strongest child.

"But," it may be objected to this view of woman's destination, "women particularly seek after and honour all mental or physical power; they love their own sex little, and judge its weaknesses more harshly than the roughness of men. However angry a master may be with his servant, a mistress is far more so with her slave, whether in the colonies or in Germany; and the Roman ladies chose to have their toilets performed by maidens with bared bosoms, so that they might, at the least mistake in dressing, stick pins into them for punishment. Mothers, as well as courts, celebrate the birth of a princess with fewer cannon shots than that of a prince. If a woman, in any trick of cards, is asked to fix on some one card, she always chooses the king or knave, at all events, never a queen ; and actresses like to perform no parts better than those of disguised young men. But one does not need to be very long in Paris, or in the world, aye, or upon the world, to guess what they want by it."

Nothing bad ; but a protector for their children. As Herder has beautifully remarked, nature has implanted reverence for men in women's heart ; from this reverence springs, in the first instance, love for men, but afterwards it passes into love for children. If even men, loving with the fancy and after preconceived notions far more than with the heart, follow actresses because they have seen them play fine romantic characters,—queens, goddesses, heroines, yes, heroines of virtue ; why should not women fall in love from reverence when they see us play the greatest parts, not as an actress does Lucretia, Desdemona, or Iphigenia, for a short evening's amusement, but for years of sober seriousness on the theatre of the world or of the state : one man is a hero, another a president, a third a king, a fourth a world-teacher, I mean an author ! Children demand this love of the mother for their father as their inheritance, or pledged property, and she can only keep some interest ; until, in old age, when the children themselves are parents, she, a grey-headed woman, as silver-bride*, again experiences a kind of love for her silver-bridegroom. In a childless marriage the wife regards the husband as her first and only son, possessed of qualities which constitute her true honour and support her during her whole life ; and she loves the young man unutterably.

§ 85.

If a young woman cherish a love compressed into the bud of esteem, she will do little less than all for her lover, or what a mother does for her child. She forgets herself in him, because only through him does she remember herself ; and her paradise is only valued as a condition and fore-court of heaven to him : and she would receive a hell at the same price. Her heart is the citadel, every thing else is but the suburbs and country round about it; and only with the former is the latter vanquished.

* In Germany, as sometimes in England, the twenty-fifth anniversary of a married couple's wedding-day is called their silver wedding-day : the fiftieth, their golden wedding-day —TRANS.

If it be true that the lost, in their haunts of misery, would gladly exchange the poisonous lures by which they must maintain and deceive themselves for the sweet intoxication of sincere heart-felt love, will not the fresh virgin heart resign all for the sunrise of life, for the first unbounded love, which is ardent in accordance with its purity and its previous non-existence, to the god-man; who, for a being hitherto bound to a little corner of the world, suddenly reveals a whole new world which is, for the maiden, this world joined with the next. Who, then, shall restrain the gratitude of love towards him who has opened happiness and freedom to a mind chained to the narrow present, who has embodied all those dreams which formerly the unoccupied soul personified in the stars, in spring-time, in friends, and child-like duties? I know him well who shall place that restraint; it is even he who requires the opposite,—the lover. Certainly a wisely and purely educated maiden is so poetic a flower of this dull world, that the sight of this glorious blossom hanging some years after the honey-moon with yellow faded leaves in unwatered beds, must grieve any man who beholds it with a poet's eye; and who must, consequently, in sorrow over the common usefulness and servitude of the merely human life, over the difference between the virgin and the matron, utter the deadliest wishes: yes, I say, he would rather send the virgin with her wreath of rose buds, her tenderness, her ignorance of the sufferings of life, her dream-pictures of a holy Eden, into the graveyard of earth, which is God's field, than into the waste places of life. Yet, do it not, O poet: the virgin becomes a mother, and again gives birth to the youth and the Eden which have fled from her; and to the mother herself they return, and fairer than before: and so let it be as it is!

§ 86.

How is it that in morally, as well as architecturally,* undermined Paris the women read the characters of

* It is well known that Paris is built from the quarries beneath it.

Heloise, Attila, Valeria, in which only the love of the heart plays and burns with as great eagerness as love letters? Women, even old women, and young men devour such works; whereas older men prefer being devoured by works of a very different kind. As in a well played game of chess, or in war, he wins who makes the first move, so must women, as the assaulted party, succumb. But who attacks us, save ourselves? And which is more guilty, the serpent on the tree, or Eve under the tree? And how small and transitory is often the price for which we bargain away the whole happiness of a woman's life! It is like Xerxes who carried a war into Greece because he liked eating Attic figs.

Farther: a woman's imagination, not worn out like a man's by wine and excitement, must all the more easily burst, on our account, into those flames which consume happiness.

Hippel remarks, and with justice, that a man overtaken in wrong-doing is ashamed and speechless, but that a woman becomes bold and passionately indignant. And this is the cause of it: the man clearly beholds himself, not so the woman; therefore, she the more readily makes her innocence appear both to others and herself. In short, our sins are more generally intentional; hers thoughtless, and therefore the more excusable.

And finally: there are everywhere more chaste damsels than young men, more chaste women than men, more old maids than, old bachelors. Man, however, may glorify himself on two accounts. First: his relations to life and the world, and his courage lead him more frequently into temptations;—and second: the man who preserves his chastity on principle possesses therein a prætorian cohort; but the woman who protects hers with her heart and from regard to social morality has a guardian angel and guard of honour. The cohort, however, is stronger than the angel and the guard.

CHAPTER IV.

EDUCATION OF GIRLS.

§ 87.

AFTER the last chapter this might be a short one, because, according to it, girls are to be educated as mothers, that is, as teachers. Our only duty would consist in giving them printed and verbal lessons in instruction:* and for this purpose no more susceptible period is offered to the parents than the time of hope and the six months of their daughter's engagement; nor to the husband, than the first year of wedded life: and then, again, that the elder daughters should be permitted to educate the younger. The last is probably the most spiritual school for obtaining clearness of ideas, patience and circumspection to which parents can send their daughters: unfortunately it is closed against the youngest child.

But before and after being a mother, a girl is a human being; and neither motherly nor wifely destination can overbalance or substitute the human, but must become its means, not end. As above the poet, the painter, or the hero, so above the mother, does the human being rise pre-eminent: and as the artist, while forming his work, does, at the same time, form something higher—himself, the creator of that work; so the mother forms, along with the child, her own more holy self. Every divinely human thing has attached to it by nature the condition of locality; the ideal dwells within the bodily manifestation, the flower pöllen within its cup: the costliest pearls, so easily lost, are strung on common bands and threads, and pierced in order to be preserved.

Since nature has ordained woman for maternity, it has also ordered her development; and we need but not to oppose nor anticipate its determinations. But as it always labours blindly and fixedly on, only for its own one-sided aims, its end or ends, so education must not attempt to vanquish it,—for every natural energy is holy,—but to make the whole nature complete by softening, purifying and harmonizing the preponderating power by means of the other balancing powers.

* Why do they not have published for them gleanings, especially for the female sex, from Hermes' many novels, rather than from other writers; since they comprise so many fine, deep, severe and weighty views and hints.

§ 88.

A woman feels, but does not see, herself; she is all heart; her very ears are ears of the heart. To observe herself and what appertains thereunto, viz. reasons, is too disagreeable for her. Perhaps it was on this account that our ancient jurisprudence sooner relieved a man than a woman from an oath, but applied the torture sooner to him than to her. Reasons change and affect the firm man more easily than the weak versatile woman: as lightning passes better through solid bodies than through the thin air.

What then will happen? Feelings come and go, like light troops following the victory of the present: but principles, like troops of the line, are undisturbed and stand fast. Shall we now by anatomising it rob the heart of its fair fulness of inner life. It were sad if one could do it; but Sömmering, after the thousand ears he has dissected, still experiences the charms of harmony; and the philosopher, even after publishing his theory of morals and of taste, still feels the power of conscience and of beauty.

Let a girl learn to prove, analyse and explain, not her feeling, but the object of that feeling; and then, having experienced the wrongness of the object, she will be compelled during the whole continuance of the sensation to follow only the insight she has gained. Do not oppose the feelings, but the imagination.

This, in a picture of war, for instance, compresses the miseries of a nation into one heart; those of a day or of a year into one moment; the various possibilities into one certainty: now, if by means of the severing concave mirror of reason, we separate this fancied focus into its various individual rays, the feeling is not destroyed, but only deferred. But, dear mother, cherish and protect every warm and tender feeling which years themselves bring and form, and do not revel in the sensibility of your youngest daughter, and lose yourself in tears of love while relating some lamentable story, or imparting such feelings in all their nakedness. For in future years either these beings will succumb to their feelings, or their feelings to them. Feelings, flowers, and butterflies, live all the longer the later they are developed. Any thing, whether mental or physical, which will certainly at some time come into real existence, may without injury arrive somewhat late, but not too soon; and the Germans of Tacitus preserved without disadvantage that heart full of energy which they gave for ever to one, even though it might not be a young virginal one, which had beaten for them in many battles.

Sin not against your daughters, nor blasphemously offend the spirit of God, by showing and recommending, even indirectly, any excellence they may possess, be it art, science, or the sanctuary of the heart, as a lure to men, or bait for catching a husband: to do so is truly to shoot wild-fowl with diamonds, or to knock down fruit with a sceptre. Instead of making heaven a means and handle for this earth, we should, in the highest possible degree, elevate this as a means of attaining that. Only an understanding of the general regulation of a house,—order, knowledge of house-keeping, and similar matters, should be spoken of as valuable for the future groundwork of the marriage tie. The so called lady-like accomplishments are, at most, but garlands of flowers by which Cupid may be bound; but Hymen, who breaks through these, and garlands of fruit too, is best guided and held by the golden official chain of domestic capability.

By persuasive speech impart clearness to principles, and, by dint of repetition, give them the force of intuitions. Especially, permit as little as possible the enjoyment of self-complacence, which, merely for the pleasure of hugging pain, flies from every cheerful light. The hatred and correction of every humour, and war against every objectless frame of mind, are exercises. Even in the smallest matters, let nothing wilful pass unpunished in your daughters.

To effect all this, some man is needed round whose firm stem this weak wavering flower-stalk may be trained. A lover before marriage generally prefers looking at the rainbow of tearful sensibilities, of fickle whims, and helpless weaknesses; but after marriage, when the rainbow turns into wet weather, he requires reasonableness and thoroughness, because he suffers more from whims which are perpetually recurring than from graver faults; and, if he does not find these qualities, he awakes from his private dreams without finding them realised. His dreams are these: he had, forsooth, when a lover, in various pastoral Arcadian hours of the heart, led his love to different resolutions,—for which he had given his own good reasons,—hence he was led to expect a marriage full of governing reasons; “For,” said he, “if now, in the warmth of youth, she already follow reasons, what will she do when cooler and older?” Merely the very opposite. For she had only paid attention to his wishes, not to his chain of reasoning, and done every thing solely from love. Wherefore, ye husbands, retain the love of your wives and you are raised above the necessity of sermons on reason. Should it be more difficult or more unprofitable, to live and act in company with your own wife and household queen, than to enter into partnership with the Virgin Mary, the queen of heaven, as a merchant in Messina did, and honourably handed over to her a share of his profits?*

Preserve girls from fear and affectation, which, for the most part, find place where reason is excluded. Even at a very early age you may cover with a coloured veil many imaginary fears: for instance, you may tell a child that the first clap of thunder she hears is the rolling of the chariot on which the so long expected spring arrives; or you may yourself unconcernedly regard animals which alarm by the rapidity of their movements, as mice; or by their size, as horses; or by their unpleasing forms, as spiders and toads. Then direct the child's eye from the whole to the individual beautiful limbs, and gradually, without compulsion, draw child and beast together: for children, unlike animals governed by instinct, have scarcely any other fear than that produced by strangeness. One scream of fear from a mother may resound through the whole life of her daughter; for no rational discourse can extinguish the mother's scream. You may make any full stop, colon, semicolon, or comma of life before your children, but not a note of exclamation!

* Neue Sammlung der Reisebeschreibungen, B. 7.

§ 89.

The morality of girls is custom, not principle. Boys might be improved by the bad example of drunken Helots; girls only by a good one. Even boys return from the Augean stable of the world with some of its smell adhering to them; but girls are frail, white Parisian apple-blossoms, parlour-flowers, from which decay must be averted, not with the hand but with fine camel-hair brushes. They, like the priestesses of antiquity, should be educated only in holy places, and never hear, much less see, what is rude, immoral, or violent. Magdalena Pazzi said, on her death-bed, that she did not know what a sin against modesty was: let education at least try to imitate this example. Girls, like pearls and peacocks, are valued for no other colour than the most perfect whiteness. A corrupt youth may lay down a noble book, walk up and down the room in passionate tears and exclaim, "I will amend;" and keep his word. At the end of forty years Rousseau accomplished his first transformation from the caterpillar state, and continued in it until death removed him by a second change. I have hitherto read of few women who have reformed themselves by other means, even in the most favourable cases, than that of a husband; and, what concerns some Magdalen asylums in great Magdalen cities, no man desirous of marrying would accept from them, as from a matrimonial-office, his wedded half, properly but a kind of broken fragment. Perhaps this consideration excuses the conduct of the world which regards the errors of men but as the chicken-pox, which leaves few or no marks behind; but those of women as the small-pox, which imprints its traces on the recovered patient, and lives on in the general remembrance.

The purer the golden vessel the more readily is it bent; the higher worth of women is sooner lost than that of men. According to the old German rural custom, the sons walked to church behind the father, but the daughters before the mother, apparently because the latter should not be much left out of sight.

Nature herself has surrounded these delicate souls with an ever-present in-born guard, with modesty, both in speaking and hearing. A woman uses no figure of eloquence—her own, at most, excepted—so often as that of accismus.* Keep watch over this guard, and pursue, by this indication of nature, the way to education. On this account mothers, fathers, men, and even youths, are their best companions; and, on the contrary, girls connected with other girls of a similar age, as in schools, provoke one another to an exchange of foibles rather than of excellences, to love of dress, admiration and gossip, even to the forgetting of accismus. Even sisters of unequal age injure one another, how much more, then, similar-aged play-fellows. To know this one needs only to listen to the mutual teasing among the members of a girl's school when perchance a young man has entered, or even approached the door. In the paternal dwelling little would be made of such a circumstance, because it would happen more frequently, with perfect seriousness, and among fewer rivals. And what more is there to say about these despotic interim-convents? Men are made for society, but women for maternal solitude. A boy's school is right, but not a girl's; just as a ship of war filled with women would be merely a castle in the air,—from its requiring so much unity, quickness, punctuality and obedience. Girls depend upon one heart, boys on many heads. The most that a girl could find in a school would be a second mother; but, the father would be wanting.

Another thing which a mother should carefully guard against can scarcely be avoided in a girls' school. It is, that as a mistress rules and speaks, (for a master would speak quite differently) and as rude, violent, dull-minded girls must be mingled with gentle, delicate and susceptible ones, the bad must be cured by means of many punishments which are poison to the best. I mean this; nothing so roughly brushes the tender auricula-dust, or flower-pollen, off the minds of girls as that old-maidish cry of alarm at our sex: that prudish abuse of a sex from which every one must make an exception in favour of her father and her husband. There is a kind of bad, unspiritual modesty that resembles the stone veil in a statue of modesty by A. Corradini, which, according to Volkman, hangs down from it clearly and separately as another body. There are certain precipices along which women, like mules in Switzerland, must not be led if they are not to fall. Definite warnings against them serve as attractions and lures. Let the parents shine before them as pure examples, and they will not need to strengthen modesty, the wing-covers of Psyche's wings, with extra coverings. By instruction a child is robbed, in the first instance, of her innocent want of shame, afterwards of its silent presence.

* So rhetoricians term the figure by which one speaks, without all longing, of the very objects for which the strongest desire is felt.

What follows is true, though in a less degree, of other schools besides those for girls. In the parental dwelling educational precept is lost in practice, and the child, to the unspeakable advantage of his feeling of freedom and his quicker susceptibility, receives all moral instruction only as the natural unobtrusive accompaniment of his thread of life; in a school, on the contrary, the child feels as if life only served for instruction, as if he himself lay like a block of marble, chisels and hammers passing over him in every direction, from which so much was to be hewn away that a grown-up man should, at last, rise from the block. The secret parental formation, under which the child believed himself to be growing of his own accord, stands here revealed in its naked aim; he feels his carnation buds opened with a penknife, not gently disclosing themselves, after warm rain, by their own native force. For this very reason a young creature would scarcely wish to remain longer than the appointed time in the school-house, but would gladly live for ever in its parent's home.

Somewhat better than girls' boarding-schools are day-schools, places where they merely receive instruction. It were to be wished that in both of these, as well as in the girls' room at home, there could be more womanly class-spirit inspired, more love and reverence for their own sex, and woman's excellence shown as well as the more brilliant advantages of men. This leads me to a disinclination not sufficiently struggled against in girls' schools, I mean that of women towards women.

When Richardson had put every means of torture, or passion, which such a preying shark hides under his skull to use against women sufferers, into the head of that devil towards women, Lovelace, against the angel Clarissa; and when he really permitted this holy virgin to be crucified by him, he could naturally only expect that women would take the part of the sufferer, not of the beast of prey; but, to his utter astonishment, every day's post brought him letters from women entreating the final happiness of the good Lovelace, just as Klopstock received similar ones for the reformation of his Abadonna. Much the same befel a converter of the heathen in Greenland; who, after having employed, as he hoped, every admitted power of eloquence to depict the burning heat of hell, saw, to his astonishment, an ever-increasing cheerfulness in the faces of the Greenlanders; until at last, on descending from the pulpit, he learned that, by his warm description of hell, he had excited a special longing in the whole congregation to go thither as to a milder climate. Such a charming hell was Lovelace to women, although a purgatory to Clarissa.

It almost sounds like satire to say that women are not particularly fond of each other, and that, with all their friendly words to one another, they rather imitate the nightingale, which, in Bechstein's opinion,* aims by its luring tones to scare other nightingales; and so the assertion of the schoolman, that they would rise up as men at the last day, may be in some measure confirmed by the nature of heaven, in which, as the abode of eternal love, women changed into men would naturally and more readily feel a universal love by the entire absence of their own sex. Moreover, we possess the facts that the ancient Roman women (according to Bottiger's Sabina) manifested a degree of cruelty towards their female slaves, and European women in the Indies also towards theirs; and the most ancient governing sister on the island of Lesbos towards her other sisters, and even towards their mothers; and, finally, modern mistresses towards their maid servants; to which our conduct towards our male domestics forms a noble contrast, so that we bear away, to our astonishment (for we often flog servants), the honourable name of the gentler sex. I only passingly mention calumination, or the "doing to death by evil tongues," whereby a parlour is converted into a canvassing society of the heads and hearts of such foredoomed women as are not there drinking tea.

* See his Instructions for catching Birds, 1796.

Should we not then, seriously, exclaim, "Oh! mother, above all other things implant and cherish in your daughter a love and reverence for her own sex. Is it possible that you cannot succeed in so doing if you show her the crown of noble women shining gloriously amid the darkness of past ages; the elevating examples of united female friends; and the relationship of all their sex's sisters with them in worth and in danger; and the thought that in her sex each honours or despises the sex of her mother; and the certainty that as hatred of humanity is punished in misanthropes, so the half of that sin, towards half the human race, will be punished in the haters of women?" Even the father may contribute his share, and indeed the largest, towards this end, by not merely preaching to his daughter but showing her more regard towards her sisters, as the mother also may show more love. And, since no precept insures the practice of any virtue, it were well if the daughter were accustomed to regard in maid-servants not merely their common humanity, but their fellowship with her in sex.

§ 90.

Some of the modern æsthetic lithologists would gladly see female flowering plants converted into petrifications: they ought, say they, to repose more fully on the rights of the stronger. First, however, it were to be wished that more wood and kernel were imparted to the present soft spongy character of men: when that is effected the woman will enclasp it like an ivy plant and form its second crown. How strong in will women are, is a question to be asked not of lovers, but of such husbands as, on their wedded penitential stools, are summoned to Socratic discourses with a female Socrates, or to such as Job's wife held. In the love before marriage the girl appears too weakly characterless and submissive; but marriage, in accordance with her destination for children suddenly opens, like a northern sun, all her blossoms, be they those of an aloe, or of a thistle. Is it on this account that most Slavonians* call their beloved, as the Poles, indeed, do all women, The Uncertain? In short, the girl matures into the mother; and the man, who wishes to possess in his wife at once a slave and a goddess, stands half discomfited by the change; the little that he can say on the matter consists in such ideas as these rather than any thing else: "He had, trusting in his own steadfastness, lovingly proposed to himself to have been a prop to her; but she had brought with her and packed up for use so much of her own that subsequently, between man and wife, the sex was as difficult to distinguish as in young birds; which was God, which Goddess, was, in his own case, as hard to guess as in the early Grecian statues of deities; indeed, it were to be wished that the similarity were less absolute."

Consequently the will of girls is less to be strengthened than bent and polished. Like plastic divinities, women should only gently and mildly express their feelings. Every outward and inward excess is a blemish in their charms, a poison to their children. Even a man chooses gentleness as the first, though perhaps not the second, mode of expressing his will and determination. No mere strength goes to war against feminine gentleness; so the tranquil moonshine is rarely broken by a storm, though the glowing sunshine may be. From the moment in which the bravest man shall speak in the gentlest manner will sweetness and compliance arise more and more in the strongest woman: she may continue to be a pyramid, but in the pyramids is found a soft echo.

Since the present warlike age and present style of German poetry send women less to the flute-school of gentleness than to the fighting-school of war, a few sentences added to this ninetieth section which, though not bringing cure, may yet possibly avert the evil, will not be useless, at least to those daughters who add their own character as a female water pipe to our present tempestuous season.

* See Anton's Essay on the ancient Slavonians, vol. i.

Passionateness in a woman's soul is often found united with all the overflowing fulness of a deep noble heart, yes even with predominant gentleness and affection ;—and yet such a hard adjunct of nature may draw the being herself, and all who love or are loved by her, into the most irremediable misfortunes.

The usually tranquil female character is naturally so much inclined to whirlwinds of passion that even the laws (those of Prussia for instance), dreading the angels of destruction in these otherwise mild angels, forbid an apothecary to sell poison to any woman, whereas they permit violent men to procure it. The laws seem usually to consider them as snow-white, snow-dazzling, and snow-cold Heclas full of fire. If, now, this naturally over-powerful disposition of the sex be increased by that of the individual, we behold a thunder-goddess, who beats down with waterspouts her little flower-children, not to mention her drenched husband, flooded house, and drowned love. A storming mother is a contradiction in education, and resembles those tropical storms which injuriously increase the temperature of the atmosphere ; whereas a storming father coolingly purifies the air. To the child, yet standing on his pure, clear heights, passion perhaps sounds as weak as does a crash to one ascending lofty mountains ; but in the valleys of future life it becomes a thunder clap, and every fit of maternal passion returns as a sevenfold echo in the married life of her daughter. As I have above said, I do not refer to conjugal love, in which, during these female hurricanes, the thin axle of Aphrodite's fair car breaks, or her yoked doves tear themselves loose and fly away, because the readers do not here require the poison to be shown them, but its antidote.

This, however, is not so close at hand, as our discourse is only of girls six or seven years old. But to oppose violence to violence, to attack passion by passion, is to try to put out fire with boiling oil : punishments, especially in early youth, do more injury than the stifling of the flames warrants; to which must be added that punishment, as is natural, only affects the passion when it has provided the match for a still greater future one. Every repetition of the fault becomes, in this case, a doubling of it, to which even the furrows of pain act as inflammatory incitements. As a physical remedy one might advise more vegetable than animal diet, and that of a cooling nature, were it not that advancing years with their fiery blood would again produce heat. But the best means to use against it in early life are the prevention of all, even the smallest, occasions for it, or sparks for the match: and, on the other hand, let every power of love, of patience, of peacefulness be cherished and manifested and employed against that consuming fire. Commands effect nothing; but examples of gentleness, whether given or related in tone and action, do all. The children of Quakers are gentle without punishment; they see their parents ever shining as tranquil white stars through the stormy clouds of foreign environment.

On the contrary, in the later years of reflection and the blush of shame, this punishment may be permitted, indeed ordained; that such a female Boreas of fifteen years old may, in the midst of her roaring storm, openly and harshly receive the metaphorical blow in the face on her burning swollen cheeks, which, given previously, without its figurative meaning, would only, as I have already said, have increased the whole swelling evil.

§ 91.

The wife of a nobleman was formerly called house-wife. The ancient Britons were often led to battle by brave women. Many Scandinavian women, according to Home, were pirates. A North American on the land, and a Parisian woman in the shop, do every thing that with us devolves on the man. Ought it, indeed, to be sufficient if a girl can sew, and knit, and net? When Sweden, under Charles the Twelfth, had sent forth all her men at the call of glory, the women became postmasters, cultivators of the land and overseers of the public offices.* And since it may possibly happen in time that all the men may be engaged in a war and peace establishment, it seems to me we should think more of educating girls to be the conductors of our business, and the managers of our estates; for, subsequently, if the men were killed, there might be another conscription and enlisting demanded from the women than that under husbands.

The gymnastics of life and labour are, if the two former sections be correct, the third commandment in female education. But these do not consist of so-called ladylike occupations. Sewing, knitting, or spinning with a Parisian pocket spinning wheel, are recreation and repose from labour, not labour and exercise; for that spinning while walking, as the Moldavians do †, at least must be ordered. Worsted work, this female mosaic work, not unsuitable for the higher classes who must refresh themselves from doing nothing by doing little, easily converts the pattern into a covering for indisposition or ill humour. Xenophon tells us that Lycurgus sent the Spartan women to the public places of exercise, and only the slaves to the embroidery frame and the spinning wheel. I do not reckon as greatest those physical disadvantages, the slavish carriage of the person, for instance, which need a dancing-school to correct what the sewing-school has done, for a watchful mother might as easily enforce correct sitting during the sewing lesson as a writing master can do during the writing lesson; neither do I reckon the nerve-enfeebling, finger-pricking irritation of knitting; and the physical evils of a sedentary life shall be treated of hereafter. But most employments of the fingers by which you attempt to fix the female quicksilver have this injurious effect, that the mind left to idleness rusts away, or is entirely given up to the waves of circle after circle spreading fancy. Sewing and knitting needles, for instance, keep open the wounds of an unhappy attachment far more than do all romances they are thorns which themselves pierce the falling rose. If the young woman have, as the young man generally has, some occupation which every moment demands new thought, the old one cannot perpetually stand out in the most prominent light. A change of occupation is especially adapted to the female character, as the steady pursuit of one is to that of the man.

* Mémoires secrets sur les règnes de Louis XIV. par Duclos.

† Sumarokoff's Tour in the Crimea.

Distraction, forgetfulness, want of consideration and of presence of mind, are the first and worst consequences of this sweet internal and external far niente; and a woman needs nothing more to poison the holy trinity of wedlock, child, husband, and self. Heavens! how a young man must every day draw his thread of life from a new fleece, or conduct his plans on their long journey nearer to the goal, while a young woman repeats yesterday in to-day as the image of to-morrow; he indeed walks, and she sits; the one is permitted to stand, the other only to sit.

The female sex has such a preference for every anchoring manner of life, that it would gladly, as Gerning says the Greek women actually did, carry a camp stool with it, so as after every step to have a seat ready at hand. Yet I should think women might be satisfied to resemble the sun in its shining and warming powers, and not also in its immovableness. They, in common with the sitting professions, tailoring and shoe-making, are the victims of spleen and fanaticism. This sedentary life, full of noon-tide rests, morning and afternoon rests, and vesper rests, in which great ladies with full tables and stomachs indulge, gives so much trouble to the doctors, running hither and thither, that finally a knowledge of medicine will be as necessary as a knowledge of French to every chevalier d'honneur and chamberlain. In such a circle one certainly need seek few Swiss heroines, not to mention that Czekleress from the district of Gyergyöer, who, in a battle with the Moldavians, killed seven of them at one stroke, and in the evening returned and was brought to bed of a son.* This circumstance happened on the seventh of September, 1685.

A certain Quoddeusvult, in the (yet unprinted) twenty-third volume of the Flegeljahre, thinks to find some excuse, when, after having spoken of the female love of sitting and dancing until he hit upon a simile drawn from those hovering flies which hover unwaveringly and shoot down swift as arrows, he thus expresses himself concerning it: "The reason why the female nature loves rest better than man's is less obvious even in crabs—of which the female has much the fewer legs under its tail—than in the human foetus itself, for the boy begins to move in the third, the girl in the fourth month. Also in the Culs de Paris is the sitting mode of life sufficiently exemplified. But Nature softens this as she does other things; she gives a desire for sour kraut and herrings as a curative diet to fever patients, and has implanted in the bed and sofa-lying woman, as well as in the lazy savage, the love of dancing. As in a concert, so in her, prestissimo follows adagio. I know not what is more necessary to the present largo di molto sitting than the hop furioso. A ball is a strengthening snail and oyster cure for crawling snails and sitting oysters; a thé dansant is the best cure for a tea drinking. The two medical fingers tread on the foot as ten medical toes; and at a masked ball the uncovered lady has her pestilence preserver in her hand, as the plague doctors formerly went about in wax masks. If you want ladies to go faster than posts and couriers, arrange an English country dance between Leipsig and Dessau, and let the girls 'chassez,' then see who arrives first, the post or the dancers,"—and so on. For however true some of it may be, it is yet better placed where it is, in the twenty-third volume.

* Supplements of the A. L. Zeitung, No. 19.

This love of sitting also affects the minor branches of family and household affairs, in which women often permit and neglect matters merely not to have to rise from their seats: they unwillingly purchase the exercise of their children with their own, or willingly delay physical, and force mental, growth. In London ringing twice summons the footman, thrice the chambermaid, apparently to give time to the sex.

§ 92.

Now how can this be obviated? Just as it is obviated among the lower classes. Let a girl, instead of her dreamy monotonous finger-work, manage the business of the household, which every moment restrains dreaminess and absence of mind by new duties and calls on the attention; in early years let her be employed in every thing from cooking to gardening; when older, from the management of the servants to keeping the accounts. What a minister is in a small state that a woman is in her lesser state; namely, the minister of all departments at once, the husband managing the foreign affairs; more especially is she the minister of finance, who, in the state, in the last resort, according to Goethe, regulates peace, as well as, according to Archenholz, the magazines of war. Even noble ladies would be healthier and happier if they fulfilled the duties of maitre d'hôtel and femme de charge, I mean for the house: I know they frequently act in both capacities for their husbands. Certainly, as a whole, the females of the higher classes are rendered more delicately beautiful by this absolute idleness; but such a Venus resembles that of Rome, who was also the goddess of corpses; among these may be reckoned her children, her husband, or herself. I do not speak about the art of cookery, in order not to be laughed at, as Kant was who wished that here (as in Scotland) regular lessons should be given in it as well as in dancing. Rather will Seneca's beautiful words addressed to sacrificers—" Puras Deus, non plenas adspicit manus" (God regards pure not full hands)—acquire a new meaning with noble ladies; and they will suppose their husbands value pure white hands more than those which present them some good dish they have cooked.

But how is it that in the order of female rank her real title, housewife, is not esteemed higher? Is it not in that capacity that as once physically, so now financially, she prepares a freer future for her children? And can a woman find that in detail beneath her regard, in which, as a whole, the greatest of men, a Cato of Utica, a Sully, and others, sought their glory? Once for all, the household must be managed in some way; and is it better that the husband should add this extra weight to his out-of-door duties? If so, I should merely be lost in astonishment that the women—for the thing is practicable, as Humboldt and others have seen examples of it among the men, in South America—do not commit to our charge the reasonable and easy duty of suckling the children. After a little creative practice there might be male instead of female, wet-nurses; the ministers, presidents, and other principals (the children carried after them into court) would stand it better than the women, &c. &c.

For the rest, let no more flighty than intellectual woman declare that housekeeping, as a mechanical affair, is beneath the dignity of her mind, and she would rather be as mentally happy as a man. Is there, then, any mental work without hand work? Do accountants' offices, secretaries' rooms, the military parade, places of government set the hands less in motion than the kitchen and household affairs, or is it merely that they do so in a different way? Can the mind show itself earlier, or otherwise, than behind the mask of the laborious body? for instance, the ideal of the sculptor otherwise than after millions of blows and chisel-strokes on the marble? Or can this present Levana appear in the world and in print unless I make pens, dip them in the ink and draw them up and down?

Ye holy women of German antiquity! ye knew as little of an ideal heart as of the circulation of the pure blood which flushed and warmed you when you said, "I do it for my husband, for my children;" you, with your anxieties and cares, seeming only subordinate and prosaic! But the holy ideal descended through you, as heaven's fire through clouds, upon the earth. The mystic Guyon, who in a hospital took on himself and fulfilled the duties of a loathing maid servant, has a higher throne among glorified souls than the general who, with the arms of others, yea, and with his own, makes wounds which he does not heal. All strength lies within, not without; and whether a poet on his printed sheet, or a conqueror on his missives and treaty-papers divide and unite countries, the difference is only externally so great as that between all and nothing: I mean to the vulgar.

§ 93.

Women are by nature intended for people of business: they are called to it by the equal balance of their powers and their keen sense of observation. Children require an ever-open eye, but not an ever-open mouth: claudere os, aperire oculos. But what circle of talking, which always encloses only small and trifling relations, could so well exercise that ever-present glance as the circle of domestic affairs? Boys destined for certain occupations, to be artists, professors, or mathematicians, may dispense with a capacity for business, but never a girl who will marry,—especially one of the above-mentioned boys. Above all things must that wandering or absence of mind be strictly combated which is no fault of nature, but solely of the individual, and is never the determining condition of any superior power. Every dissipation of mind is partial weakness. For instance, were the poet or philosopher who wanders about so absently in the outer world, which is foreign to his sphere of action, to work with equal want of reflection in his inner world, which alone he has to observe and govern, he would certainly be either mad or useless. The same thing is true in the opposite case; if a woman, indifferent to the outer practical world in which her business lies, neglects it for the sake of the inner. If, now, a girl is intended to grow up with a clear eye for every thing round her,—if she is not to waste her many eyes in company, as Argus did his, by misplacing them as painted eyes in a peacock's tail; or if she is not, like that sea fish, the turbot, to have two eyes on the right side, but, in compensation, to be blind on the left,—let her be many-sidedly exercised in household affairs; and the parents must not be disturbed if some admirer of an ethereal bride should find fault with her, as Plato did with Eudoxus, for having profaned pure mathematics by applying them to mechanics; for to-day or to-morrow the wedding comes, and the husband, the honey-moon being past, kisses the mother's hand for all that the daughter does beyond his expectations.

§ 94.

Let every thing be taught a girl which forms and exercises the habit of attention, and the power of judging things by the eye. Consequently botany,—this inexhaustible, tranquil, ever-interesting science attaching the mind to nature with bonds of flowers. Then astronomy, not the properly mathematical, but the Lichtenbergian and religious, which with the expansion of the universe expands the mind; along with which it does no harm if a girl experiences why a longest night is advantageous to sleep, a full moon to love. I should also even recommend mathematics; but here, unfortunately, women who have a Fontenelle for astronomy have not one for mathematics; for, with regard to girls, I only mean those simplest principles of pure and mixed mathematics which boys can understand. And geometry itself, as a second eye, or dioptric line, which brings as distinct separations into the world of matter as Kant has done by his categories into the world of mind, may also be commenced early; for geometrical observations, unlike philosophical, strain the mind to the injury of the body as little as the external sense of sight. Sculptors and painters study mathematics as the skeleton of visible beauty without injury to their sense of beauty: I know a little girl of two years and a half old who recognised, in the full foliage of nature, the dry paper skeleton of the mathematical figures which she had learned to draw in play. In the same way these little beings have early developed powers of calculation, especially for the important part of mental arithmetic. Why are they not also taught a multiplication table for the reduction of the various kinds of money and yard measurements?

Philosophy is something quite different, indeed diametrically opposite. Why should these lovers of wisdom and of wise men learn it? A lottery ticket with a great premium has been occasionally drawn from among this sex—a true born poetess; but a philosopheress would have broken up the lottery. A woman of genius—Madame Chatelet—may understand Newton in English, and render him into French; but none could do that in German for Kant or Schelling. The most spiritual-minded and intellectual women have a way of their own, a certainty of understanding the most profound philosophers, which even their very scholars despairingly aim at—namely, they find every thing easy, especially their own thoughts, that is feelings. In the ever-changing atmosphere of their fancy they meet with every most finely-drawn skeleton of the philosophers; just like many poetical followers of the new schools of philosophy who, instead of a clearly defined circle, give us a fantastic wreath of vapour.

Geography, as a mere registry of places, is utterly worthless for mental development, and of little use to women in their vocations; on the contrary, that is indispensable which, teaching the enduring living history of the earth—in opposition to that which is transitory and dead—is at once the history of humanity, which divides itself into nations as well as into contemporaneous historic periods, and also that of the globe itself, which converts the twelve months into twelve contemporaneous spaces. The mind of a girl attached to her chair and her birth-place, like an enchanted princess in a castle, must be delivered and led forth to clearer prospects by the descriptions of travellers. I wish some one would give us a comprehensive selection of the best travels and voyages round the world, shortened and adapted for the use of girls; if the editor were well furnished with Herder's patience and insight into the most dissimilar nations, I know of no more valuable present to the sex. With regard to descriptions of places, every station requires a different one, a merchant's daughter one very unlike that provided for a princess.

Almost all this equally applies to petrified history, which only conducts from one past age into another. For a girl it can scarcely be too barren in dates and names. How many emperors in the whole history of German emperors are for a girl? On the other hand, it cannot be sufficiently rich in great men and great events, which elevate the soul above the petty histories of towns and suburbs.

Music, vocal and instrumental, is natural to the female mind and is the Orphean lute which leads her uninjured past many siren sounds, and accompanies her with its echo of youth far into the autumn of wedded life. Drawing, on the contrary, if carried beyond the first principles, which educate the eye and taste in dress more perfectly, steals too much time from the husband and children; therefore it is usually a lost art.

One foreign language is necessary, and at the same time quite enough, for the scientific explanation of her own. Unfortunately French pushes itself most prominently forward, because a woman really must learn it to comply with the necessities consequent on the billeting of French soldiers. I would wish—why should one not wish, that is, do every day of the year what one does on the first?—that a selection of English, Italian, Latin words were placed before every girl as an exercise in reading, so that she might understand when she heard them.

The talking and writing world has sent into circulation so large a foreign treasury of scientific words that girls, who do not, like boys, learn the words along with the sciences, should have weekly lessons in them out of a scientific dictionary, or translate into comprehensible phrases tales in which such anti-Campean words are purposely employed. I wish that for this end an octavo volume full of foreign words, with an explanatory encyclopædia to them, were published. The best women read dreaming (the rest truly sleeping); they pass gliding as easily over the mountains of a metaphysical book as sailors do over the mountainous waves of the ocean. None of them ever thinks of asking the dictionary, nay, not even her husband, what any word means; but this vow of silence which regards asking questions as a forbidden game, this contentment with dark thoughts, which possibly learns in the twentieth book the meaning of a scientific term used in the second, ought to be prevented. Else they will read books as they listen to men.

There is one charm which all girls might possess, and which frequently not one in a provincial town does possess; which equally enchants him who has, and him who has it not; which adorns the features and every word, and which remains imperishable (nothing can exist longer) while a woman speaks;—I mean the pronunciation itself, the pure German indicating no birthplace. I entreat you, mothers, to take lessons in pure German enunciation and to rehearse them constantly with your daughters. I assure you—to place the matter on a firmer foundation—that a vulgar pronunciation always rather reminds one of a vulgar condition, because, in general, the higher the rank the better is the pronunciation, though not always the language. The higher ranks, contrary to Adelung's change of words, are not the best musical artists of language (composers), but they are the best deliverers of it (virtuosi).

Girls, unlike authoresses, cannot write too much. It is as though on paper, this final metamorphosis of their dear flax, they themselves experienced one, and, in the backward viewing of the rough and smooth external world, won space and rest for their own inner world; so often in letters and diaries do we find women, the most ordinary in conversation, reveal an unexpected spiritual heaven. But the theme on which and for which they write must not be one drawn from a learned caprice, but from the observation of life—for their sensations and thoughts depend upon climate far more than those of boys; of course I speak of real letters and their own diaries, not mere exercises. From this cause—that an appointed goal marked and restrained their course—the author has received so many eloquent, profound and brilliant letters from feminine, nay, masculine, minds, that he has often exclaimed in vexation, “If only five authoresses wrote as well as twenty lady-letter-writers, or twenty authors as well as forty correspondents, literature would be of some value!”

§ 95.

The greatest part of the above will help to form female power in connection with female mind, activity along with gentleness: not only in marriage, but in the woman herself, ought there to be a reflection of that heavenly zodiac in which the Lion shines beside the Virgin. Intellect acts democratically on the mind; feeling, monarchically. Any circumstance, even dressing for a ball, seizes on a woman, like the Romans on the Sabines, and tears her from her inner world. One who before the toilet for the ball can think of any thing better loses many more inches of mental elevation. The present governs none more powerfully with one single idea than minds which step dazzled out of their little dream-cell into the clear daylight.

On this is grounded the well known experience that they are never ready till it is too late, and have always forgotten something. But how easy were it to send a daughter every week into the struggling school of improvement! Let the father say, "Dear Nanny, Fanny, or Annie, if you are ready dressed in one hour you shall dance to-day." In a similar way he might cure them of forgetfulness and want of punctuality by pleasure parties, as stipulated rewards for immediate cessation from their occupations and quick packing up of all necessities.

§ 96.

There is just as much to be said against the vanity of women as against the pride of men; that is, just as little. Charms, which like flowers lie on the surface and always glitter, easily produce vanity; hence women, wits, players, soldiers are vain, owing to their presence, figure and dress. On the contrary, other excellences, which lie deep down like gold and are only discovered with difficulty, strength, profoundness of intellect, morality, leave their possessors modest and proud. Nelson could become just as vain by decorations and the loss of his eye and arm, as proud by his cool bravery. No man can with sufficient liveliness place himself in the position of a beautiful woman who carrying her nose, her eyes, her figure, her complexion, as sparkling jewels through the streets, blinds one eye after another with her dazzling brilliance, and risks no capital in exchange for her profits. Contrariwise the very clever and learned rector creeps behind her, like a man chained and imprisoned, covering his inner pearls with two thick shells: and no one knows what he knows, but the man himself must admire and dazzle himself only.

The desire to please with some good quality which rules only in the visible or external kingdom is so innocent and right that the opposite, to be indifferent, or disagreeable, to the eye or ear, would even be wrong. Why should a painter dress to please the eye, and not his wife?—I grant you there is a poisonous vanity and love of approbation; that, namely, which lowers the inner kingdom to an outer one, spreads out sentiments as snaring nets for the eye and ear, and degradingly buys and sells itself with that which has real inherent value. Let a girl try to please with her appearance and her dress, but never with holy sentiments; a so-called fair devotee, who knew that she was so, and therefore knelt, would worship nothing save herself, the devil and her admirer. Every mother, and every friend of the family, should keep a careful watch over their own wish to praise—often as dangerous as that to blame—which so easily names and praises an unconscious grace in the expressions of the heart, in the mien, or in the sentiments, and thereby converts it for ever into a conscious one; that is to say, kills it. The counting of his subjects lost them to David. The gold presented by demon hands vanishes when spoken of. While man finds a cothurnus on which to raise and show himself to the world in the judge's seat, literary rank, the professor's chair or the car of victory, woman has nothing save her outward appearance whereon to raise and display her inner nature; why pull from under her this lowly foot-stool of Venus? And as man stands in some college or corporate body, as in an assurance office for the maintenance of his honour, but woman only asserts the lonely worth of her own individuality, she must attach herself to it all the more strongly. Perhaps this is a second reason why women cannot endure modified praise; for the first is surely this, that from want of self-division, and owing to their constant subjection to the present, which always presents the bitter more powerfully than the sweet, they are more sensitive to the limits set to the praise than to the praise itself.

We will now pass to the clothes-devil, as the old theologians formerly called the toilet.

What else does a woman's dressing-room signify than the attiring-room of a theatre? And why, then, are there so many sermons against it?

The preachers do not sufficiently bear in mind the following considerations: to a woman her dress is the third organ of the soul (the body is the second, and the brain the first), and every upper garment is one organ more. Why? Because the body, her true wedding-gift is more completely one with her destination than ours is with ours: while ours is rather a pilgrim's or miner's dress with its protecting apron, hers is a coronation robe, a court suit. It is the holy relic of an invisible saint which cannot be sufficiently worshipped and adorned; and the touch of this holy body works all kinds of miracles. To cut off a man's hand was in early ages scarcely less dangerous than to touch a woman's, on which pressure the Salic law lays a fine of fifteen gold pieces; a violent kiss formed the ground for a criminal indictment; and in Hamburg there is still a fine of twopence on every kiss imprinted in a work-shop. Hence dress and ornament must be as important to women as varnish to paintings; they must regard them as a multiplication of their surfaces or facets. Hence for the most part women visit a lying-in-state to see how people look under the ground among the dead. Perhaps the love of dress may be among the causes of our having had great female painters, but no great female musicians; for a great space in women's pictures is filled with dress, but in music they think they cannot be sufficiently seen unless they sing. Hence, also, light falls on the female art of putting on a shawl of a Hamilton. Even in old age and on the sick bed, of both which a man takes advantage to make himself comfortable in night-cap and dressing-gown, they still put on an ornamental costume, not to please men but to please themselves: in the most secret coffin of the most lonely Carthusian convent of La Trappe they will not be behind the exhumed corpses of Pompeii, which advantageously display themselves to posterity in ornaments and ear-rings. If there were a Miss Robinson Crusoe on a desolate island, with no one to please but her own reflection in the water, she would yet every day make and wear the newest fashions. How little they make themselves into artificial work and three-cased watches for the sake of men may be seen in the fact that they never dress more carefully than for ladies' parties, where every one studies and vexes the rest.

Unembarrassed by witnesses, each one places herself before her ideal world—the mirror—and dresses the bridal pair. Formerly, in France, every woman carried a glass on her person, apparently to be more agreeable to her friends, and to indemnify them by their own pictures for the bearer of them. In Germany, in olden time, a mirror was bound up with the hymn-books—why is it not so now? Pity that such loss of the divine image should be caused by the want of a looking-glass!

On this same ground of natural destination not even the cleverest can pardon the censure of her personal appearance; she even values its praise more highly than that of her mind. From the time of Louis the Fourteenth the French kings have sworn never to forgive two things, both perpetrable only between man and man, the duel and something worse. Women will willingly forgive all save one thing; not, indeed, the denying of their charms, but the loud proclamation of some deformity or want of personal attraction. And every man's tongue which could declare such a thing is immorally cruel. Woman, more subject to the sensuous present, to appearance and opinion than we are, must painfully feel her affirmed unsightliness to have, as her beauty has, a wide extending influence. I should even consider this very speaking of it cruel did I not know from my own experience, as well as from that of others, that a woman's lovely heart as completely effaces all external blots as an unlovely one does all personal charms; and that a fair soul has at most only the first moment, but a foul one the whole future, to dread. Woman's body is the pearl oyster; whether this be brilliant and many-coloured, or rough and dark from the place of its birth, yet the pure white pearl within alone gives it value. I mean by this thy heart, thou good maiden, thou who expectest not to be appreciated, but only to be misunderstood!

From the destination of women may possibly be derived the greater coldness and severity with which women of rank treat their female domestics; they cannot conceal from themselves many resemblances and many possibilities of exchanged circumstances; in which husbands, to whom more is attributed in the proposition of indifference than in that of contradiction, readily confirm them. Women, especially beauties, regard very little the difference of mental cultivation; men that only in regard to their servants; and Pompey, assured of his victory, did not inquire whether his cook looked as he did.

Woman's love of dress has, along with cleanliness which dwells on the very borders between physical nature and morality, a next-door neighbour in purity of heart. Why are all girls who go out to meet princes with addresses and flowers dressed in white? The chief colour of the mentally and physically pure English women is white. Hess found white linen most used in free countries; and I find states all the more modest the freer they are. I will become no surety for the inner purity of a woman who, as a counterpart to the Dominicans who wear white in the cloister but black when abroad, only puts on the colour of purity when walking in the streets.

I might speak of the wardrobe—the female library; for our white cloth consists of black on white. I might also ask whether girls do not love clothes more on this account; because they make many of them, and consequently enjoy all the more heartily a garment they have made in their own little summer-house. But the more immediate question is, how the water-shoots of a flowering branch engrafted by nature are to be repressed or cut off?

Animate the heart, and it no longer thirsts for common air, but for ether. No one is less vain than a bride. Mark out for your daughter any long course to some important business and she will look the seldomer about her. A true work takes possession of the author as well as afterwards of the reader—neither thinks any more about himself. In a sea-fight no Nelson is vain; in a land-fight, no Alcibiades; in a council of state, no Kaunitz.

Let a daughter learn and exemplify the artistic charm of dress on other persons.

Treat her as an artistic mannikin and lay the value on the product itself; she may then regard herself as an actress who does not become a queen by means of her dress. Costly clothes make much vainer than pretty ones.

Do not permit nurses, ladies' maids and such-like locusts, to praise and deify the dressed-up girl: yes, even keep a sharp eye on her play-fellows, especially those of lower rank; because they readily lose their astonishment at the fine dress in admiration of the wearer.

Ascribe to cleanliness, symmetry, propriety of dress, and all the æsthetic requisites of beauty, their brilliant and true worth; so a daughter, like a poet, forgets herself in her art and in her ideal, and her own beauty in what is beautiful. She will be a painter who paints herself—whom not the original, but the copy, charms. Finally, if the mothers are not their own incessant purveyors of fashionable dress, nor a fruitless tulip-bed of modish colours, much, if not all, is done for the daughters.

§ 97.

I could write a whole paragraph merely in favour of cheerfulness and merriment in girls, and dedicate it to mothers who so frequently forbid them. But seriously to assure girls they may laugh on suitable occasions would look very much like presenting them an opportunity of doing so. Mothers have much a habit of grumbling, even though they may smile inwardly; the daughters, on the contrary, generally only laugh visibly. The former have passed out of the triumphant church of virgins into the church militant of matrons; their growing duties have increased their seriousness; the bridegroom is changed from a honey-bird, who invited them to the sweets of the honey-moon, into a resolute honey-hunting bear, who will himself have the honey.

Then all the more, O mothers! grant these dear light-hearted beings* their sports around the flowers; their minute's play before long years of serious duties. Why may not comedy precede tragedy, with them, as with the Romans? If the boy may be a zephyr, why may not the girl be a zephyrette? Is there in the whole range of life any thing so beautiful, so poetical, as the laughing and joking of a maiden who, still in the full harmony of all her powers, plays with every thing in luxurious freedom, and neither mocks nor hates when she jests? For girls, the antipodes of fish, which, as is well known, are not only deaf but also possess no diaphragm, have and impart the true sportiveness of poetry, so difficult for authors to imitate, so unlike satire and the humour of men. Their seriousness is rarely so innocent as their fun; and still less innocent is that supercilious discontent which converts the virginal Psyche into a heavy, stupid, humming, wing-drooping moth; a death's head, for instance. The melancholy night-flyer may possibly please the lover; but the husband requires his day Psyche, for marriage demands cheerfulness. In a certain Libyan people* the young man married that girl among his guests who laughed at his jokes; perhaps my meaning is contained in that custom.

Laughing cheerfulness throws sunlight on all the paths of life. Peevishness covers with its dark fog even the most distant horizon. Sorrow causes more absence of mind and confusion than so-called levity. If a woman can perform this comedy in promptu in married life, and occasionally enliven the serious epic of the husband, or hero, by her amusing heroic ballads, or get up, as the Romans did, a merry farce against misfortunes, she will have bribed and won joy, and her husband, and her children.

Never fear that feminine merriment precludes depth of soul and feeling. Does it do so in men? And did not the lawgiver Lycurgus, and his Spartans everywhere, build an altar in his house to Laughter? It is precisely under external cheerfulness that the quiet powers of the heart increase and grow to their full stature. How heavenly must it be, then, when, for the first time, the smiling face weeps for love, and the irrepressible tears mirror the whole gentle heart!

Wherefore, ye mothers, do not merely suffer but assist your daughters to become externally French girls, internally German, and to convert life into a comic poem which surrounds its deep meaning with merry forms. I know few books to recommend for this purpose—we men always think of these first when advice is to be given—besides the letters of the incomparable Sévigné. But wit, mere wit, is—in opposition to æsthetics—the comedy and humour of women; an epigram is to them a humorous chapter, a Haug or a Martial, a Sterne or an Aristophanes. They will laugh themselves ill, or rather well, about the curious marriage of the great and little; which only seems no mis-alliance to man surveying the long connected chain of being. But laugh away! and may your mothers read you many epigrams! I wish much there were a suitable selection of these for girls, and a few comic works written expressly for them, which would certainly sound very French! Then let the dear merry children laugh to their hearts' content among one another, and especially at any grave pompous man who comes among them, even were he the author of this ninety-seventh paragraph.

* Alex. ab Alex. lib. I. c. 24.

§ 98.

Inquiries might still be made concerning the education of women of genius, and one of a peculiar nature required for them. But I will only insist the more strongly on the necessity of an ordinary one for them, which may act as the balance and counterpoise of their fancy. Genius—which with wonderful works as with holy festivals breaks into the common course of the week—cannot be learned, can be very little taught, and not at all overcome; and will boldly raise its brow above time and sex and every difficulty. Talent, not genius, can be repressed, that is, annihilated; just as a compound can be destroyed, that is decomposed, but not a simple power. And truly, were the repression of genius by circumstances possible, we should never once have experienced its existence. For then genius, always appearing only as the one intercalary day of many years, as one single day contradicting and voting against a majority of 1460 days, must have fallen a prey to the opposing tendencies of its age—that is to tendencies which, enslaving men from the earliest times, would bind them down to the latest—as a horse to the multitudinous stings of bees. Nevertheless, genius has existed, for we have the word. They whom it inspired made, like other generals and monarchs of this world, separate treaties of peace with their neighbours, and only after death a general one with the whole world.

But if a man of genius must also be a man and a citizen, and, if possible, a father too, a woman must not suppose herself elevated by her genius above her appointed day-labour in life. If a Jean Jacques write upon education, an intelligent Johanna Jacquelina need not be ashamed of the occupation of intelligent men; on the contrary, the rare excess of female talent should rather be an additional call to education than a passport for neglecting it.

But, if women are ever ashamed of acting up to the ideas on which they pride themselves, their destiny avenges itself upon them justly and severely.

First, justly. For woman is appointed to be the Vesta, or Vestal priestess, of home—not the sea nymph of the ocean. The fuller she is of an ideal perfection the more must she endeavour to express it in reality; as the ideal of all ideals—God—has manifested Himself in the world; she should educate a daughter as He educates the whole human race. If a poet can express his ideal as well in the narrow limits of the Dutch school as in the far horizon of the Italian, wherefore should she not be able to express hers in the kitchen, store-room and nursery?

And, secondly, the punishment of the neglected relations of life is severe. A woman can never forget to love, though she be a poet or a ruler. Then, instead of children, women of genius seek the society of men. By these they expect to be loved as women, though they themselves only love as men. So they, like flying-fish between the two elements, hover between manhood and womanhood, injured by both, and persecuted in both kingdoms. They then become the more unhappy the wider their intellectual circle extends; a poetess, for instance, becomes more so than a painter.

But, if they unite their woman's destiny with genius, a mighty and rare blessedness fills their hearts; the clouds which pour their floods in the valleys, gently dissolve on their heights as on mountain tops.

* What is most to be desired for such heads is a crown, a prince's or a ducal coronet; and this brings us to the next chapter.

CHAPTER V.

PRIVATE INSTRUCTIONS OF A PRINCE TO THE GOVERNESS OF HIS DAUGHTER.

§ 99.

PERMIT me to embody in a dream the few thoughts I have to offer on the education of princesses. The dream of which I speak elevated me at once above all middle grades into the rank of princes; an elevation you will please to ascribe less to secret veneration than to excessive newspaper reading. It seemed to me, then, that I was called Prince Justinian, and my consort Theodosia, the mother of the Princess Theoda, and our governess Pomponne, apparently some French surname. The private instructions which I imparted, my princely hat upon my head, to Madame de Pomponne, may sound sufficiently dreamy in somewhat of the following form:—

My dear Pomponne, I like going at once openly to work. What my consort arranged with you yesterday about Theoda's education I ratify with pleasure, because she wishes it: but as soon as you have read my wishes on this subject I confidently expect some private alterations in the list of rules which has been laid before you. For truly I give out my laws as readily as another, though I also intentionally receive some; one cannot always have the crown close at hand in one's pocket, as the German emperors formerly carried their imperial insignia along with them in every journey: but let people beware of resembling my royal cousins, who—albeit the ancient Persian kings dared refuse nothing to their queens on their birthday—scarcely ever close their birthday-festivals.

I confess that shortly after my nuptials I hoped my wife, like those in humbler stations, might possibly take upon herself the education of a future princess, and that you would merely have borne the title of governess. In fact when I, who best know what a longest day and a longest night combined in one four-and-twenty hours signify, take into consideration the tedium of a court, I should think that a princess, who must feel it even more severely than a prince, would for that very reason gladly expend her time and her whims on the education of a daughter. Since one becomes so weary of courtiers, who, like people in boots and stirrups, always think they stand on the palace floor most securely with bended knees, that one actually longs for dogs and parrots and monkeys; because they, indifferent to rank, are always free, new and interesting; surely my child, who in a court belongs to the small number of my equals, and therefore ventures freely to say what she thinks, must be even more interesting. And should not an excellent royal mother, who can devote whole years to a painting or a piece of embroidery, more gladly sit to herself and paint herself in the living copy of her daughter? And why do the simple priests at the altar only pray that princesses may become happy mothers, and not that they should continue such by educating their children?

But these are only questions. There are many difficulties which my beloved Theodosia could not so easily overcome as my paternal imagination fancied. For the rest she is so loving and tender a mother, as you will yourself experience, that she seldom or never permits a week to pass without once sending to call Theoda.

Nevertheless, dear Pomponne, much, indeed most, depends upon your love and attention to the child. I yesterday heard and subscribed the long chapter on external propriety, royal female dignity and reserve; so let that be; and I will myself, at the right time, procure the princess a dancing-master from Paris who shall instruct her in the art of raising or letting fall her train. But, my good lady, I hope you will not carry too far that self-confining fence round every step, that consideration of every verbal expression, that squeezing mould, and that crooked or straight bending of the body. Oh! my good Theoda! must it be so? Court is indeed a pays coutumier, and only the country a pays du droit civil, which the regal palace least of all is. Many attitudes and impetuosités which, in my officers, I should regard as improprieties and offences against my majesty, are in me, the master, treated (perhaps from flattery) as original traits, as piquant and amiable peculiarities; and the earnest wish is expressed that they may be frequently repeated. Acting on this method of interpretation, I pray you to permit the princess always to run a little. After my marriage I became acquainted with one of the fairest and most amiable princesses—excepting, of course, your mistress—who had the charming ill-manners—any thing else in her were not to be supposed—of never moving in a concert-room, or other assembly, save at a running pace with full sails. And what said the court, and foreign princes, myself among the rest, to this? We all praised her animation! Now, had she been twelve years old, and her governess present, that celestial animation might have excited a fire of a very different description.

Must, then, poor unhappy princesses be deprived of all soul, and converted into mere machines of propriety, and be placed in the court as in an ice-oven through which the little naphtha-flame cannot pass? Must a princess be indeed so closely imprisoned that she may never venture to cross a bridge on foot, except the fancy park-bridge? Are tears the best princess's washing water? It is at least fortunate that we princes have given our name to something harder—prince's metal. Must not the poor children, in later years, be bound down in formality with golden chains, pompously introduced into life's desert where love is not, and banished under the polar sky of the throne, which sends forth as much fog and frost as does the actual pole? Even a ruling master lies oppressed under it, who could be very different and thunder. By all means let every thing during public exhibitions and festivals be measured and cold; but not so when she is alone with you. White gravel may lie glittering and smooth on the garden walks, but no one uses it in flower-beds. The Duke of Lauzun said, To make princesses love you treat them harshly and scold them unceasingly. You will certainly not confound this ducal method of securing love with that to be adopted by a teacher. You admire, as I heard you say on Sunday, the Scandinavian mythology. tell me, now, would you wish only to be Nossá * to my daughter and not also Gefione? Health is the true Gefione; and may this goddess lead Theoda by the left hand, as well as Nossä by the right!

* The goddess Nossá gave maidens beauty; Gefione, protection.

Certainly a beautiful princess has more subjects than her prince, and certainly nowhere does female beauty display its bloom so perfectly as on the Alps of the throne; but my offspring will not give to posterity a perfectly bloomed flower. The prince's hall in which, as in a fortress, the German future lays down its safety and its freedom must indeed be built by fair and tender, but also by strong hands. If every mother is a being of importance I should think a royal mother is one of the greatest importance. If I can only arrange it so Theoda shall accompany me next July, and I shall have the pleasure of accompanying you. I will then effect much. It is stated in the Indian travels of the old Mandelsloh that only the kings among birds of paradise have feet; apparently we princes are only birds of paradise, and every common person is our king. But at that time my Queen Theoda shall go on foot; and, what is more, she shall ride on horseback, which no Roman Dictator ventured to do. I really do not like to think how the health of royal persons must be undermined by things which they probably drink every day; had I an hereditary prince royal I should almost lose my senses with anxiety!

I should wish you to allow my Theoda to read more English than French books, and more German than both. I know not what witty author* has shown the similarity of the courtly and worldly tone of mind to that of the French literature; at the same time, the thought is striking. In a French book we always live in the fashionable world and at court; in a German book occasionally in villages and in the market-place. I must also have the princess lose some of that awful ignorance about the people which makes her imagine them only a multitudinous repetition of the fat servants who stand behind her chair to remove her plate and clear the table. She must not fancy that a beggar cannot be relieved with silver coin, because for convenience she only carries with her gold. This, however, is but a very small matter. In German books as a whole there predominates a healthy force of affections, boldness of language, love of morality and religion, carefully balanced understanding, sound-common sense, unbiassed all-sidedness of view, hearty love of human happiness, and a pair of eyes which look towards heaven. Now, if this German strength and purity be ingrafted on a mind tenderly formed by sex and rank, it must necessarily bear the loveliest flowers and fruits.

* This was I myself in the third volume of the Ästhetik; but in dreams the best known things are forgotten.

A French library, on the contrary—if I do not judge unjustly, embittered by Gallic newspaper writers and by my old loyal tutors—is nothing better than a kind of anteroom or exchange. Theoda would only read in it what she every day hears;—the same softness of speech with hardness of thought (just as mineralogists append to their newly discovered stones the soft Greek termination ite, as Hyalite or Cyanite);—the same flattery of diametrically opposed occurrences, because the man of the world resembles the Epicurean who denied that a proposition was either true or false; the same resemblance in other matters of the worldly man and the Frenchman to the Epicurean school which, unlike every school of philosophy, had no sects because the whole school agreed about wine and meats, women and God.—

No, no, let my Theoda read her Herder (she will hear Voltaire in plenty amongst her chamberlains) and Klopstock and Goethe and Schiller. You, dear friend, of children and of French people, are a quite sufficient French library. Formerly in German courts—not merely in mine—your countrymen and their works were equally welcome and effective; as if what the Romans found in real life, that Gallic slaves made the best shepherds,* were also true figuratively, and that your nation could furnish the best shepherds of the shepherds of the people—that is to say, tutors of princes—and also the best shepherds of the people—that is to say, princes.

Only do not forget Rousseau and Fénelon, nor Madame de Necker and her Mémoires. A book more delicate, refined, elegant, religious and, moreover, interesting is scarcely to be found for well educated women than this by Madame de Necker, whose jewels possess as much medicinal virtue as colour and brilliancy. But her daughter, Madame de Stäel, may postpone leaving her cards for my daughter until the girl is old enough to receive so intellectual a visit.

* Meiner's History of the Decline of Morals in the Romans, from Varro.

German princesses now fill and unite almost all European thrones; as—if I dare speak so pedantically—Aurora's rosebuds do the mountain tops. Formerly, as Thomas remarks, heathen princes were converted to a better religion by their marriages with Christian princesses. This achievement cannot now be expected from any princess; but it is well for her if she have been brought up in a pure religion. He who has no higher and firmer heaven above his head than the canopy of the throne, composed of wood and velvet, is very circumscribed, and has but a narrow prospect. And he who, on the blooming heights of humanity, attains no happiness is, if he possess not God in his heart, more helpless than the most lowly who, in lamenting over his own humble condition, seeks the hope of improvement. Religion only can reward and arm with energy, tranquillity, life and peace princesses who, like Narcissus, are too frequently sacrificed to an infernal deity. By what other aid could women in former ages, when there was less refinement, endure and even forget to grieve at the rudeness and cruelty of men, than by that of religion, which transfigured many an hour of tears into one of prayer? A woman, to whom so much perishes ere she herself dies, needs, more than a man does, something which may accompany her as a glorious star from youth to age. And what is the name of this star? In the morning of life it is the star of love; later, it is only called the evening star.

Henry the Eighth of England forbad women to read the New Testament; the age, alas! does so now. Happily for my wishes I know you and your sex. An unbelieving princess is almost as rare as a believing prince, and you perhaps grant both. In earlier ages, it is true, we find Gustavus, Bernard, Ernest, and some others, anchored to religion as to a firm mountain.* My position may possibly lead me astray, but I confess that to every ideal I form of female beauty a throne is the footstool. My travels may form an excuse for this—but so it has always been with my ideals of woman's mental beauty, and I have ever seen it crowned. "With thorns?" you ask. "Probably," I answer, "but also with gold."

* E. g. to the mountain of Tachwa in Novgorod. Hube's Physic, vol. i.

In short, I believe that a certain ideal delicacy and purity of the female soul can be developed nowhere so beautifully as in the highest position—on the throne—as the loveliest flowers bloom on mountains, and the sweetest honey comes from hilly countries; two resemblances which hold forth a promise of the third. As female nature for her fairest flowers requires forms and customs, which may be compared to fine soil and elegant vases, whereas man's roots can press through and burst open the hardest earth and rocks; so she finds what alone she needs at court, which is, confessedly, all form and custom, and that of the narrowest and most absolute description—I do not say this, self-laudatorily, of my own—for the mere fact of an education among the highest ranks, as well as the contemplation of the most refined politeness,—these forms and reflections of morality,—will be there not only as the reversed and dim counterpart, but as the original bright-coloured rainbow. I might also adduce decency, honour, propriety (of the men as well as of the women), delicacy, forbearance, which are all required by courts; and not merely, as is falsely supposed, in the public, but also in the private personal demeanour; I mean in every word by which the courtier expresses, not himself, but something better—a moral seeming.

Woman's virtue is the music of string instruments, which sounds best in a room; but man's that of wind instruments, which sounds best in the open air. As men always act most honourably in public—the act of cowardice which might be committed in a closet or in a wood becomes impossible at the head of an army or a nation, and as we royal martyrs in our apartments too much resemble the Greek tragic actors whom the chorus never left for a moment alone on the stage, and, finally, as women, avoiding the observation of many eyes yet pay regard to them by the fairest actions, my proposition is natural.

I can still add something. The princess, free from distracting labour in the rough service of life; placed in the mild climate of physical repose, advantageous to the heart as well as to the beauty; brought up rather to observation than to action, at least unless she absolutely will, without compulsion, enter that black pit of statecraft at whose mouth prince and minister throw off the mantle of love, as they would give their servants a woollen cloak to hold;—I really do not remember how or why I began, but I do know this; that the nobler class of women, even after a long black funereal train of misanthropical experiences, still keep alive their loving heart and genuine feeling; whereas men in such cases, yes, even sometimes after one single grievous misfortune, bury their desolate lost heart in the perpetual hatred of their species. A woman could more easily close for ever her mouth than her heart.

Why waste many words? I have seen excellent princesses. Without the advantages of the throne they would have lost much, and without its disadvantages, the rest. In fact, patience, a little suffering, and that of the mind—as when, for instance, years convert the wedding-ring into a chain—and other things of a similar nature form within the flower the fruit, and within that the seed of a heavenly life.

To this head belongs the patience necessitated by the courtly tedium of our rank. The Sabbath was especially ordained by Moses as a rest day for slaves; but it is precisely this day of rest which at court is converted into a day of unrest. As often as my people envies me during these tumultuous festivals, I seem to myself to resemble the Spartan helots who were flogged to death to the sweet sound of flutes.

My dear Theodosia would gladly have her daughter as highly gifted as herself, and therefore strongly impressed upon you the desirability of cultivating her imagination. It is, perhaps, because I myself am of a dryer and harder nature, and prefer keeping myself warm with my wings to flying far up into the cold ether, that I lay so very much stress on my daughter's possessing sound common-sense. Indeed, if I could, I should like to undermine this powerfulness of imagination. Fancy in a princess produces a great many fancies in a prince; hence arise storms in the royal atmosphere and all kinds of volcanic products, burning of the treasure closets, maledictions on the crown jewels, and much else that I could name. If a fanciful woman could carry the whole verdure of the country, in its meadows and its woods, compressed and poetically sublimed into one ring, on her finger, in the shape of the largest emerald—by Heavens! Pomponne, she would do it! Therefore, I would most gladly exchange it for a sound understanding, if I had it not. I grant one can make but very little show with it, but then one can judge all the more correctly. And this I certainly know, that many a princess, who, during her husband's reign, modestly showed herself as nothing more than a sensible affectionate mother and wife, could, after his death, (I pray you call to mind the widow of my dear old friend in M—g—n,) replace the father by the mother of her country, and with her clear eye, and ear open to instruction, rightly guide the vessel of the state. Fancy and fancies on the throne, round which, as round other heights, more winds blow than behind the low hull of the ship, are only full spread sails in a storm, which the captain, or the understanding, ought to take in.

I would wish Theoda to have as much cheerfulness as possible, but wit only in moderation. The latter, when united with good sense and a constant kindly heart, may perhaps guide, or, at all events, drive the prince consort, as the weak sorceress formerly ruled the devil; but wit alone without heart, salt without meat, transforms a woman, like Lot's wife who became a pillar of salt from whom the old Lot parted and went on his way.

But to return to the imagination. I should be glad, Madam, if you could discover, or excite in my daughter a talent for either music or drawing. Music, if only listened to and not scientifically cultivated, gives too much play to the feelings and fancy; the difficulties of the art draw forth the whole energies of the soul. Hence a certain minister, Hermes, in Berlin,* recommended girls to be taught thorough bass. 'Drawing also is good, although it has the disadvantage of giving too much preponderance to a woman's naturally keen eye for forms. One thing or the other; a painting, for instance, at which a princess has laboured for about half a year, if it have not been produced with the help of the court artist, as private instructor and father of the piece, would to her,—a bee imprisoned in the variegated tulip-bed of the court,—smell sweetly as the flowers; for thus she possesses something which she sees daily grow under her hands, in which consists the happiness of life. The old Saxon princess who, as I have read, embroidered the banks of the Rhine on a robe, was certainly as happy, yes, happier, while embroidering it, than in the robe itself. At the present day half her heaven would have been stolen from her, since, as I hear we no longer possess the left bank.*

* Now consistorial-councillor in Breslau. Princely and dream-like transmutation withal.

With regard to female vanity you need do—that is, say—nothing; for every word in your apartment is useless if, in the evening at tea or in the concert-room, Theoda hear the very opposite from grave men and women, who think to do honour at the same time to both rank and sex, and by this very confounding of both constantly intrude the latter on the poor child. As she grows older a very marked admiration becomes the duty of every courtier, since, unfortunately, the stupid printed genealogical tables every year declare the age of a princess; in London they act in a still more foolish fashion and actually shoot the number of years into people's ears by the discharge of cannon; therefore, she need not—like the modern Roman women, whose dislike of perfumes keeps them at a distance from the altar with its incense—retreat from the admiration naturally attendant on her rank and sex, but simply remain standing.

And now I come to the most important point; namely, —all of religion and human happiness which I have hitherto desired at your hand for Theoda must assist and be subservient to her princely destiny, and not by any means work against it. Consolation and fortitude I would wish her to draw thence, but no arms against her parents' will. This, between ourselves, is what I mean. Since my last travels I do not feel by any means certain that, in eight or ten years, my Theoda, regarded as a cement of severed lands, or rivet of different crowns, may not be united to a prince whom, which Heaven forbid! she may from her heart detest. To this fear royal parents must submit: in fact, I must regard the glory of my house; and I have always considered children as royal pledges, whom I have only to place as far from me as possible in order to win an extension of territory. Wherefore, Madam, on this point my daughter must learn to give no other answer than yes. Would that bridegrooms were as easily selected by diplomacy as brides! Still some good may be made out of the worst case; and on the rocks of the throne, against which others make shipwreck, we can only bleed. A woman, previously so undetermined and obedient to the whole compass of male zephyrs, becomes, under the influence of a fixed husband who determines her fate, a steady trade-wind. The most ugly often becomes, at the altar, or shortly afterwards, the most beautiful; and a similar change often accompanies precisely opposite conditions. The priest's words, like lightning on the magnet, easily reverse the position of the positive and negative poles.

* Written in 1805.

But too much of this. I consider my little future son-in-law to be honourable, and no one yet knows what kind of a man may grow out of the merry boy. But even supposing that the priestly blessing were to the princess a priestly anathema, and that her honeymoon were passed in courtly mourning, yet I cannot help her, at all events before she gives her hand.

It is true that in Loango a princess, and only a princess, can choose what husband she will; and in Homer, Penelope had a hundred-and-eight wooers, without reckoning the absent husband; but that is of no avail to our princesses, especially before marriage, for those are neither our times nor countries. Diplomatic marriages must be like English soldier marriages, provided not merely hands and hearts but whole countries are to be united. Should it really happen that a throne became a Gold Coast where a daughter was sold into a slave ship, then you can give her no fairer princess's dowry and marriage gift than a mother's heart; this will compensate her for all her sacrifices: a child's love is more certain than a husband's.

After such confidence I require from you no other answer than the future, which the governess of a princess holds more surely in her hand than does the tutor of a prince; for the latter is relieved and removed, and his successors less resemble the popes, each of whom continued the building of St. Peter's, than princes who, for the most part, leave the buildings of their predecessors unfinished. You, on the contrary, may long lead Theoda by the hand; perhaps even till you resign it into that of her husband. May you succeed well!

JUSTINIAN.

My dream came to an end along with my letter and I arose. But as I laid aside the crown along with my night-cap and became as usual a private person, a critic who should blame any thing in my instructions would prove nothing more than that he was ignorant of, or indifferent to, Kant's axiom, that a deposed sovereign can never be punished for faults committed by him on the throne. It is something quite different when I am awake, and then fall into errors.

FIFTH FRAGMENT.

CHAPTER I.

ON THE EDUCATION OF A PRINCE.

§ 100.

MANY readers, especially critical ones, will probably, without my aid, make the remark and the reproach, that in the former Chapters I have treated of the particular before the general,—of the education of women before that of men, which extends into a wider sphere of moral, intellectual and æsthetical development; and that, again, in this Chapter the particular education of kings is placed before the general one of men. And, truly, in the fragment about girls, readers will miss any systematic order, and only find a systematic want of order for women. Now, should any one forget to make these remarks and reproaches, they are here set down ready for him.

Moreover, in treating of the education of a prince, the author must again avail himself of the kind reader's former permission, to turn letter writer; but in this instance he did not dream a letter in bed, but really sent the subjoined one by post.

LETTER

ON THE EDUCATION OF PRINCES, ADDRESSED TO MR. ADDELHARD, PRINCE'S TUTOR AND PRIVY COUNCILLOR.

Bairenth, Oct. 1, 1805.

Your invitation, my dear friend, to visit you, and the prince at his country residence could not have come more opportunely than just now when I am in the very act of packing up and taking flight because the lava stream of war seems to take its course towards our country. And, what is still better, I am at present engaged on a Doctrine of Education in fragments, one of which, at least, must contain a few words about the education of royal children; and I am very much mistaken if I shall not find with you that Magna Charta and electoral franchise which is the most important for a prince; namely, that which the tutor lays down and prescribes for the little prince. In fact, I expect from you two patterns; one of a teacher, and one of a pupil.

If you will not regard it as a jest, dear Adelhard, I will now write a long letter, divining and predicting what you have begun and accomplished with your pupil, merely that I may place the letter among my fragments as a pocket mirror for princes' tutors. It seems to me that when I prophesy my predictions at once become rules.

For I have a kind of dislike absolutely to lay down rules. If one must place oneself in the soul of the pupil, in order thence to educate him, the task becomes in the highest degree difficult for any fellow-creature, especially for the tutor of a prince; because the external conditions of royalty differ from ours not in degree but in kind. Kingly government is totally different from any other; we only experience power over parts, not over the whole; we see approaches to ourselves both from above and from below: the prince sees one; but the highest and the lowest servants of the state are to him equally distant from the throne, equally incapable of holding the sceptre. While common plants are contented with the common earth and air, the prince, like a plant of foreign growth, requires a peculiar soil, a southern aspect, and a hothouse.

Therefore the choice of the royal gardener is all the more important. Fortunately the kingdom of education, at least, is an elective monarchy. Even the court—which formerly employed learned men as the fair Spaniards use glow-worms at night, only as glittering gems, but not as the Indians do fire-flies, as lights—regards the choice of a prince's tutor as a matter of sufficient importance to break it up into sects. Do you not remember the Schismatics and Separatists in the court of Flachsenfingen about the choice of the prince's tutor? I once related them to you on the very best authority, in the presence of the principal governess of the royal children. You, dear Adelhard, were only selected by the father and mother for their child, so that no one should be able to say which of the four human beings was the most fortunate. But in Flachsenfingen the queen-mother and her party declared in favour of the flat, dull-gold, court preacher;—the king and his adherents concurred in desiring to secure my services:—the third party, that of the lord high chamberlain and his worn out favourite, the chief governess, all my declared enemies, unanimously voted for that genteel, nice, young man whom we all pretty well know, that wretched powder without report which every one previously avoided. So very wisely does a court know how to unite the happiness of the country with the good fortune of its own relatives, by seeking the former through the latter! This is the reason why courtiers do not appear by any means so unselfish and honourable as they are. Just as the banker at a great gaming-table fastens to his hat the card (let us suppose it the ace of hearts) upon or against which he will not bet; so the marshal by a golden star, and the governess by a golden heart, as symbols of light and love, showed which were the two cards on which they would never lose nor win anything. This is what many people call intriguing for the choice of the prince's tutor.

Charles the Great, owing to his physical strength, was called an army: every prince, owing to his political power, may be regarded as a moral army; and this army at first has no other generalissimo than the tutor. He alone may freely instruct and touch the mind, which, in after years, will neither experience nor suffer contradiction. This task is more easy and varied than that of any future favourite; for he has only wax, not marble to shape. He may be bold enough to oppose and punish the passions of the little prince, which his subsequent attendants will only use and misdirect. Yes, he may carry his influence so far—which never minister or favourite yet did—as to gain such a victory as Fénelon, who transformed an ill-disposed duke of Burgundy into a pure noble-minded man, whose premature death probably opened the entrance into the great catacombs of the last century. The knowledge, the habits, the principles, the tastes, which he may give or leave to his pupil, work either for or against all future influences. He may, in a spiritual light, imitate the men who carried torches before the Roman emperors even in the day time. In short, he may—if he possess the power within himself—combine in one office both the characters of that Dionysius who was a king in Sicily, a schoolmaster in Corinth. Let him at least strive to do so! For to the perfect formation of a political prince a man of moral power is necessary; he may be called tutor to the prince, but he, in fact, as a spiritual father, first gives permission to wear the crown;—as the pope, in his character of holy father, gave a similar permission to the Jesuit, John the Third, to assume that of Portugal.

Is there, then, my friend, for the whole human race, not merely for the royal parents, a higher moral and intellectual sphere of action than that of tutor to a prince; who, perhaps, in the royal child holds in his power the future of half a century—a something which may either be the fructifying germ of an oak forest, or the powder train of a mine for his country? If it be granted that the first circumstances of a man's education, as the deepest and richest, bear all the rest which time heaps on him, I cannot consider the wish too bold, but only natural, that, as there are normal schools for teachers, so there should be at least one of that kind for the tutors of princes.

But I will now—so as to have something to put in my book—cast the nativity of the past and present, and predict what you have done and are now doing.

I suppose, from your residence in the country, that you will as frequently as possible forbid the court to your Friedanot (a fine-sounding and significant name!), and persuade his parents to see him, for the most part, without lookers on. If the cloud of flattery may be, to a prince, a falling mist, it is to a royal child a rising mist, which is followed by dark, bad weather. How else than by distance can you protect your Friedanot from the ladies of the court, who must press around him, allured by his three graces, of being a prince, a child, and a boy.⁶ Than this union there can be nothing greater in a woman's eyes. As the emperor of Morocco, so Agrell tells us, is drawn by a team of twelve state-horses when he takes a drive; so our little heir to the crown can command, when he will, twelve children's carriages, each with a dozen lady-drawers. And when at last he becomes twelve years old he will be absolutely worshipped beforehand, so as to secure his adoration afterwards. Character and childhood are both at once destroyed by early gallantries which incite to gallantries.

The men of the world reserve their influence for this age. If any thing, like poison on the nerves, destructively opposes the earnestness of a royal tutor's labours—or, indeed, of any teacher—it is the worldly views of worldly people, even when honourable and impartial. Like the founder of their order, Helvetius, these modern Helvetians, in whom no Cæsar finds an enemy, can be good natured, lovers of the arts, farmer-generals and every thing good, but not martyrs to their faith, nor keepers of their word. In other respects these Helvetians are good enough; like their geographical namesakes they are lovers of cold,—herdsmen on the heights for which their home-sick hearts long; “no gold, no Swiss”—united by confederacy—upright in deeds, if not in words—without much money; mere door-keepers of palaces,—in short, men who willingly stand and suffer themselves to be ordered about as guards and hirelings in the court of a Louis the Fourteenth. But such, Adelhard, are not fit companions for an heir-apparent. If you have to conduct your pupil through two totally different worlds, out of the one into the other—out of that really great world in which only nobility of soul, character, great principles and comprehensive views are valued—where only the despisers of pleasure and the passing hour, the men of eternity stand—where an Epaminondas, a Socrates, a Cato, still speak from their tombs and deliver oracles as from an everlasting Delphic cavern—where earnestness of purpose and man and God bring all things into life; out of this into that world of sham-greatness, in which all that is great and departed is little esteemed, and what is trifling and present is alone held important—where every thing is custom, and nothing duty, not to mention kindly duty—where the whole country is looked upon as an estate, all offices as appendages of the crown; where inspiration seems a passing love affair, or a mere artistic talent—if you have to do this, must not all these glittering influences destroy that of the tutor? Must not the child become a kind of double creature, a double stone, half diamond and half common court crystal, which needs but the application of heat to sever the scholastic addition from the courtly mass,—just as other double stones are tried and burst asunder by heat.

You are, then, right in regarding the easy attainment of a glitteringly-cut outside as a small recompense for the damage done by people of the world. Must he not, without your help, pass his whole life among decorators and manufacturers of cosmetics, as under curling machines for royal heads? And will casiness of demeanour ever become difficult to him who, from the freedom of an upright posture, has but to return bows? Nevertheless it will do so; every thing, crime excepted, becomes princes; they, like great artists, are permitted many external peculiarities; nay, are imitated in them: and what in lower stations is considered want of good manners, in the highest is held to denote their superabundance, or at all events, to be a veil of Moses drawn over the splendour of the crown. Stiff citizen-manners occupy only the middle place, the extremities approach one another so closely that in the highest ranks the freedom of the savage is renewed.

But you will reply to me in your next letter and complainingly say, I can take my Friedanot nowhere but a court will follow him: where a prince stamps his foot a courtly circle rises—as an army did at the approach of Pompey,—and the altars of incense smoke around him; for truly the middle and lower ranks flatter their prince more injuriously, that is more grossly and slavishly, than the nobility. It is probably on this account that many novel writers think they present us with the most beautifully sculptured heads of princes on their coin by merely permitting the little dauphin, prince of Calabria,* prince of Brazil, protector of England, to be educated and kept in perfect ignorance of his future rank. In this case the dauphin apparently imitates the Lamelukes,* by the laws of whose empire only he may ascend the throne who was not born upon it. The opponents of these few novel writers are merely the whole class of historians. For although Macchiavelli remarks that the best among the Roman emperors were those who had been adopted, yet—besides the exception of Augustus, who adopted himself to the government, and also besides that of many emperors chosen by the senate and the prætorian band—other histories are opposed to that of Rome; take, for instance, that of the East which never depicts viziers, beys, and sultans, brought up in slave ships and promoted to the ranks of pilot and captain, as better princes than others. Further; have the popes made better rulers because they were not born to be popes? And when (as on the extremity of the opponent's chess-board a pawn may become a queen) a peasant, Massaniello, for instance, becomes a king—is his government, therefore, so very markedly different from that of those who had expected it for twenty years? And, moreover, in the olden time was not every usurper and destroyer of freedom a man who, in his childhood, had possessed no prince's tutor, no court, no royal father?

* Bolingbroke's Political Letters concerning Europe.

On the contrary, a prince can never contemplate soon enough the Tabor of the throne, so that in after years he may be gloriously transfigured on it, and not hang as a cloud on the mountain. It is the Sinai on which he, praying, shall receive the laws which, in their reflected brightness, he is to carry down to the desert. I could recommend no other refuge from anticipated courts for an heir-apparent than a foreign country, where the native prince would draw away all flatterers from the stranger. But the evils consequent on the necessary contemplation of his future high rank may be guarded against in many ways. A child's views of life must necessarily be confused if his master is at the same time his servant; or, like a bad royal tutor, a compound of tyrant and slave. There may be inequality, but let it be upwards. With us lower people every father is at times the fellow-labourer and fellow-teacher of the schoolmaster; should not the father of his country also occasionally be the father of his son and successor? Antiquity holds out the example of princes who were the play-fellows of their children; how much more praise would they merit as their teachers! I can imagine no more honourable group than a royal father among his sons, earnestly instilling into them the high laws of the kingly office which he himself religiously observes.

But if the affairs of government occupy too much of the father's time, or if this recreation would abstract him too much from business, the queenly mother is still there with the powerful influence of her heart and of her leisure. Baron, the actor, said that a tragedian should be nursed in the lap of queens. It seems to me that the dauphin, whom he represents and imitates, claims the first place there; and such a mother will be more usefully employed teaching her son than her husband how to govern. "Crowned mother, do for your son what the uncrowned mother of the Gracchi did for hers, so that he may be as noble as either of them, and more fortunate than both." So, my dear Adelhard, would I speak almost in public, in the hope of perhaps cheering some princess who has thus acted.

It were also desirable if kings' children could associate with their equals in the school-room;—I mean if there were a school for princes, in a higher sense than that near Naumburg. We, linked together in a community of children, were all educated under the mutual influence of equals; the heir to the throne sits in the room alone with his tutor. Princes only learn the art of war with an army of fellow-students; perhaps that is an additional reason why they understand and like it best.

I am not without the expectation that you attempt to preserve Friedanot, although he is now more than eleven years old, from poison to a childlike mind by obliging him to pay deference to age and merit. As yet he is merely a subject, like his tutor and even his mother. This is a matter of great importance; for the child who does not respect grown-up people as such, readily enters the path of contempt for his fellow-men,—a vice very prevalent on the throne. If rank, especially a prospective one, outweigh the man to whom properly he ought to bow, in after years the masses of citizens will, in his princely eye, resemble those stags' heads in Fontainebleau under which was inscribed—"Such or such a Louis did me the honour of shooting me;" and the smaller select number will be like certain royal stag-hounds in the same country, which a courtier addressed as "Vous, Monsieur Chien," though in former times the term "monsieur" was only applied to the saints, and afterwards was refused even to the five directors of Paris. Since in the eye of princes, as in that of the law, or still better in the union of both, individual peculiarities are lost in one living mass of souls, it is an easy change for a crowned despiser of humanity to regard those souls as the mere mechanism of peace and war, till one man only seems to exist—himself.

Therefore, let a prince, as long as he is a child, always measure merit by inches; for inches are to him yet as though they were long years, and years as munificent gifts. It is certainly a trifle that you, as I venture to guess, contrary to custom, do not permit the servants to help the prince first when older guests are at table; but the opposite method would not be a trifle. A Louis the Fifteenth (how great a love of children that monarch had in the days of his innocence!) may always give his play-fellows an order of blue and white ribbon,* and a medal with the picture of the pavilion in which they played; but the child should not receive the ribbon of an order appropriate to mature years as a leading-string; still less should he, as the monarch I have just named and his predecessor, Louis the Fourteenth, hold a lit de justice almost in his cradle, or, like other royal children, grasp the staff of a commander in the hands which yet feel the rod. Why might not as well little ministers and presidents surround the throne of the royal child, and little ambassadors of the highest rank accompany him in his carriage? This degradation of the state and of human nature, works like a destructive poison on the excitable mind of the child. To this cause may be traced that premature, worn-out, shallow-cunning, cool expression on the faces of so many royal children,—an expression compounded of the presumption of rank and youth, and the weakness of age.

* Fragments de Lettres orig. de Mad. Elizabeth de Bavière, etc. i. 253

Strange that, while writing this, your last letter but one, to which you referred in your last epistle, has just come to hand. I now understand much. Your recent Friedanot's festival might really be celebrated as the alliance between my prophecies and your rules; or as the passage from what has preceded to what is about to follow, from negative to positive education.

To proceed, then: only princes and women can be educated for a determinate future; but all other men for one which is uncertain, for the empire of chance in their aims and ranks. Now this is the living spirit of your life, and of that entrusted to you. The education of a prince, like his position in the state, is the only one of the kind. As your pupil can never think too modestly of himself, so can he never think too proudly of his dignity; the reverse of this produces misery everywhere. His office, a high office at the altar of the state, demands from a fallible human form the powerful agency of a god. He is not merely the first servant of the state, but its very heart, which alternately receives and sends out its life blood; he is its centre of gravity which gives form to its varied powers. Then let German philosophy show him in his high station something different from what the persiflage of French philosophy and that of worldliness exhibits; which endeavours to represent the throne as the highest heritable place at court, or as a regency with a handsome income, and the country as a vast regiment at once ridiculous and useful. Ah! verily the ancient error of regarding princes as the sent and anointed of God (which in fact every man is, only in different degrees—the man of genius, for instance, or every rational creature as compared with the beasts) is much nobler, and more efficacious for good, than the modern error of declaring them only to be the ambassadors of selfish extortions, that is, of the devil. But let German earnestness of heart show the young eagle-prince his wings, his mountains, and his sun. When some warm, benevolent, but too rash, genius of the earth saw the erring efforts of humanity to shape its course, and how, broken up among individuals, it, like the sea, only raised waves, but gave them no direction, he longed to give the ocean a boundary and a rapid current; then he called up the first great king to collect the scattered forces and guide them to one end. Moreover, this genius would have experienced the bliss of seeing nations linked together round our globe like the glittering girdle of Venus, had he not forgotten something which another and better genius, who always permits more men of genius than spiritual monarchs to appear at the same time, remembered. I mean, if he had taken care that a continued succession of good kings had drawn a holy family circle round the globe, and described a ruling line of beauty, happiness and honour through all time. Oh! what might not poor humanity have become if, like the thirty popes who, one after another, continued building the great cathedral at Rome, a contemporaneous and successive band of princes had, joining temple to temple, so urged on the great temple-building of humanity! Can humanity blame fate for opening to it, through one individual, the way to the highest elevation or the lowest degradation, when one reckons the number of princes with free power to be the leaders of their age and country, and, like many flat glasses placed at once before the sun, fancies them united into one celestial luminary? It is not Heaven's fault, but man's, if they have more readily converted themselves into the war-gods and scourges of states, than into their protecting deities.

I would, therefore, imitate you and teach the prince his dignity; because only he adorns the station who believes himself to be adorned by it. Princes are apt to think meanly of princes, as mountains look little when viewed from mountains.

I would indeed, as your fellow-labourer, prepare yearly, —say, on his birth-day,—a feast of dedication for the young heir-apparent, a rehearsal of his coronation, in which the holiness of his future, the inviolableness of his soul, should be gloriously and intimately presented to the young eye longing after virtue, under the triumphal arch of great and free nations, in sight of the arms and banners of his ancestors and of all past ages. On such a day he might also look down into the abyss of fallen nations. Let him learn by heart Plutarch's histories of the great, more useful to him than the more recent: and let him every day pray out of the meditations of Antoninus Let that noble order,—the name, Father of his country which the great Camillus first bore, as founder of the order, and subsequently Cicero, the enemy of Catiline, as a member, until it lost its glory and sank down upon a Caesar, an Augustus, and such-like men,—burn before him like an illumination on the seven hills of freedom. He must not consider himself as a commander-in-chief of all the forces, nor as a minister of foreign affairs, nor as president of the council, nor as chief justice, nor as a rector magnificus of all the sciences, but as the PROTECTOR OF HIS COUNTRY, in the highest sense of that word; as one who has his eye on every department in the state, like the true judge of works of art who can appreciate every form of beauty. He should be a Jupiter who bears his satellites and his courtly ring at once round himself and round their common sun.

"According to the usual requirements of learned men," you write, "a prince who would govern well ought to unite in his own person the knowledge of all his ministers so as to be able to judge of all their affairs. But the knowledge of things, which cannot all be embraced by one individual, is less necessary and less possible than the knowledge of men by whom they must be proposed and executed. Consequently, if the prince have only character and if that have matured steadily and purely under the eye of his teacher, he will be able both to penetrate into matters and to use vigorous measures." You might have copied this out of my own soul! If men have been easily able to blind us, yet, in a hundred cases, some weakness in our heart, rather than any weakness in our eyes, has been first to blame. Among princes a pure and firm character is especially needed for seeing and acting; for on the throne the nerve of sight is easily transformed into the motive-nerve of the muscles. Mere goodness without character will, or may, be governed and used by all the enemies of a people; whereas character without goodness can only be acted on by one enemy of the people—itsself.

The whole present time is a regicide of character, especially of all healthiness of character; for over it poisonous victims are passed to bodies and souls, and for the sacrifice of a god, a man is offered up. Hence so many marrowless but sceptre-gripping arms; hence the life of so many princes is but a passive "council of five hundred;" and even good may only be done and published by permission of the subjects.

So much the better, dear Adelhard, that you endeavour to give your pupil a strong body; only watch over him till he has passed through the usual powder mines of royal youth,—the capitals, for instance, of the grand tour, a few middle-aged women, and his majority.

From your letter I can perceive the truth of the supposition I cherish, that you do not recommend or cultivate in Friedanot any active love of the arts of painting, music or architecture, lest, as you say, "he should convert government into a subservient art." Nero, truly, had a genius for art,—as Frederick the Great had a genius for government,—his whole life, from the time of his subjection to the laws of art,* even in the midst of his cruelties and down to his last sigh, testifies as much feeling for art as absence of feeling for humanity. If, for instance, a prince devote himself—not to adduce more ancient, still less modern, examples—like the Macedonian king Europus, to making candles (in a metaphorical sense that would be good); or, like the Parthian kings, to sharpening swords (that were good in a different way); or, like Attalus Philomator, to the cultivation of poisonous plants† (this only admits of no good metaphorical sense) the whole court, suppose that of Attalus, would be converted into a garden, and every one would seize the royal gardener by his weak side,—his botanical mania. All courtiers wish their king to love something besides government and his country. Every great lord, according to the law, must practise some handicraft; but only in the same way that every Mussulman, and every Rabbi among the Jews, must understand some art, and not, as Montesquieu and some others suppose, in order that he may refrain from strangling people for pastime: for, as an inspired person, he is allowed free by his religion, fourteen of such for slaughter every day.* I should suppose that he could not claim, by club-law of his handicraft, any more for his sword.

* He obeyed the orchestra-regulation, never to sit down, to have no occasion for pocket-handkerchief or spittoon, &c. Tac. Ann. xiv. 15.

† Alex. ab Alex. iii. 21.

Am I not, then, agreed in opinion with you when I say that princes need no subordinate pursuit any more than ancient statues needed the adornment of colours? How much useless knowledge about history, languages and art, might and ought to be spared them!

A general love of science, like an alternation between two heights, enriches and refreshes royalty, as was exemplified in Frederick the Great. There is a wider prospect from Parnassus than from the throne. I wish that even there, as in the high schools, reading and learning were called government. And what greater ground for alarm would there be, if the king were president of the great academy of all the sciences, than that favourites and courtiers would become members of it, and understand a great deal? And is it not very much better that he, like Louis XIV., should expend sixty-six thousand three hundred livres in pensions to learned men, than that, like the same king, he should waste thirty-three millions of livres in the mere lead of the palace at Versailles and its water-works?† Openly tell your Friedanot that in every country, where the press is free as well as where it is submitted to censorship, there is no one to whom so many books are forbidden as to the king himself; the censors will scarcely allow him a newspaper. Although the king need not know so much of law as his lord chancellor, nor so much political economy as his prime minister, he yet must know as much or more of the art of war than his first general. This union of sceptre and sword is unmistakeable. The royal infant even is consecrated to no other inaugural post of honour than that of war. A helmeted preface (præfatio galeata) precedes his life; he passes his mornings in the arsenal. No prince scruples to serve in war among the soldiers of a greater foreign prince than himself, and to fight and bleed for him as unconditionally as his meanest subject; but he would consider it beneath his dignity to be the same monarch's prime minister, president of his council, or even general-in-chief of his forces.

* The Prince Kantemir's History of the Ottoman empire, in Struve's Lebenstunden, v.

† Pièces intéressantes et peu connues, par. M. D. L. P., I. 1805.

Whence arises, and why is there, this equality of royal and warlike honour in this and other points, as if the prince were only the first servant of the state by being its foremost fighter?

Voltaire's saying, "The first king was a successful soldier," and the corollary to be drawn thence that "A successful king is the first soldier," does not sufficiently explain his position in a state by his position before there was a state. Moreover, war is now only the exception, and peace the rule; and however much the country be turned into an arsenal, and the throne into a fortress, yet preparations for peace must be carried on as long and as industriously as preparations for war. But the preponderance of the arts of war over those of peace, in all persons destined for the throne, may be explained and justified by two totally different reasons and sentiments. In the first instance, the mutual defence of individuals formed the state; and afterwards, as each nation experienced the necessity of defending itself against the aggressions of other nations, the king seemed to perform his duty to the state best by watching over its frontiers, not by becoming chief architect, food-provider, farmer, coiner, and regulator of its domestic affairs; he had rather to act externally by the law of the stronger, than internally by the power of the affections.

One evil was a necessary consequence of this state of things, that nations,—which, in the last resort, only consist of individuals—owing to this love of war in their governors, fell into that very condition out of which the individuals had endeavoured to extricate themselves by combining to form a state. So little yet does man regard the interests of man! Confined to his clod of earth, like the insect to its leaf, he does not perceive that every war on the face of the globe is, in fact, a civil war; and a dark sea, in a spiritual sense as truly as in physical fact, gives, by its concealing cloak, the appearance of separate enchanting islands to the girdle of mountains which surrounds the world.

But the monarch has a yet weightier ground for his love of war; the sentiment that all dignity arises from moral worth, and that the chief basis of manly dignity consists in courage or honour. The brave prince covers his head and his inner man with a crown different from that which rests on his outward form. Courage or honour is expected in every man, but not talent. The prince, like the first nobleman in the highest rank of nobility, must oppose his enemy with the courageous point of honour, as though it were a bright focus of burning rays. Courage is a virtue of no doubtful seeming; there can be no contradiction, no diversity of opinion, about it. A prince who exposes his body, carefully protected and consecrated by the state, as though it were a common one, to the rank-scorning bullet, against which, in a foreign land, his crown is no helmet, but only a mark, gathers laurels with his own hand in the eyes of thousands. But the honour of peaceful talents is not so uncontestedly ascribed to him, because many a prince has been a sun which the minister must surround with his clouds ere it emitted beams.*

I grant that war is accompanied with certain by-charms. It is well minutely to dissect them before him to whom you would fain render them hateful. A king likes to govern, especially when he can do so easily and absolutely; on the drum he finds a moveable throne; and the art of war is surrounded with a poetical halo; it is more definite and more obvious than the art of government, and the movements of the general's baton are more clearly marked by the eyes of men than are those of the sceptre.

The powder-mill of war moves on the wheels of fortune. As the southern promontory of Africa, so here the head-land of storms is called the Cape of Good Hope. And to what lottery could a ruler more cheerfully subscribe than to that of war—especially because he only ventures foreign possessions, and wins no part of his home inheritance, because he wins the whole? Further, nothing irritates a youth so much as to be obliged to mount the throne when of mature age, and then find his whole life, even down to the horizon, marked out and enclosed. The royal youth longs, in the first place, to do something in life; and, in the second, to render himself immortal by it. Now, for the accomplishment of the first wish, what means lie so near him, or seem so glorious to his fancy, as war, which opens to him a career in foreign countries? or what can gratify the second desire more easily than the field of battle, which matures in one day the precious flower of immortality, which would require a whole life to blossom on the throne? The noble Henry IV. of France said, "I would rather gird on my armour than make laws." It is on the same principle that novices in poetry, and novices on the dramatic stage, make their first essays in the horrible, the glory arising from which is easily and quickly gained.

* According to Herschel, only the cloud-covering of the sun gives light, and the body of sun only spots.

I think you say in one of your letters that the satiety princes experience of the praise and emulation of inferiors is apt to engender a warlike longing for a contest with kings and enemies before the eyes of all Europe. Very true! The poisonous air of courts readily communicates that yawning fever of which so many died in Italy during the seventh century. Men seek to clear the air with gunpowder.

But how can a young prince ever behold the dark side of the glittering form of war, that hellish stream which surrounds the living earth and is peopled with the dead? For it is in truth necessary that he should do so, especially for Germany, which is becoming more and more the Hyde Park and Bois de Boulogne to which Europe resorts when it resolves to fight. Will you let him hear the chorus of all wise men and poets cursing war, the last ghost and savage army of barbarism? Will you, before war, preach such a sermon as this on peace to the king who is about to hurl his torch-like missive to kindle the fire of war? "Consider well: one step beyond your frontiers changes the whole face of two empires; thine own is consumed behind thee, thine enemy's before thee. That moment an earthquake takes possession of both, and labours to the destruction of both; all ancient law courts, all judgment-seats, are overturned; heights and depths are confounded together. It is a last day, full of rising sinners and falling stars; it is the tribunal at which the devil judges the world, where bodies condemn spirits, physical force the power of love. Consider it, O prince! Every soldier in this empire of lawlessness becomes thy crowned brother in a foreign land, bearing the sword of justice without her balance, and governing more despotically than thyself. Every meanest drudge in the enemy's ranks is thy king and judge, carrying in his hand an axe and a halter for thee. The arbitrary powers of force and chance only sit upon the double throne of conscience and of knowledge. Two nations are converted, half into slave dealers, half into slaves, mingled without order among one another. In the eyes of higher beings, the human race has become an assemblage of lawless, conscienceless, stone-blind beasts and machines, which robs, devours, strikes, bleeds, and dies. Even granting that justice be on thy side, yet by the first line of a manifesto, as by an earthquake, thou lettest loose the chained devils of injustice out of their prison-house! The dread despotism thus enthroned is so great that little misdeeds never reach thy ears, and great crimes only by their frequent repetition. For the permission to slay, and take possession includes in itself all lesser crimes. Even the unarmed citizen's voice is heard amidst the screams and discord, exchanging all his plans of life for a few moments' indulgence and lawless freedom, treated by the allied soldiers as partly, and by their opponents as altogether an enemy. Think of all this, O prince, ere thou hide thy light amid the locust-clouds of war, and ere thou make the warriors of a stranger the judges and executioners in thy hitherto justly governed land, or ere thou give thine own soldiers such power in the conquered country!"

At all events, much might be done. We should endeavour to verify the expressions of a history or a newspaper, so short and so lightly passed over, "Battlefield, distress of the besieged, a hundred waggons of wounded;" which by their perpetual repetition have passed from living figures to paintings, and lastly, to mere sounds; we should picture them in all their terrible details, in the suffering which one wagon bears and fearfully increases, in the one agonizing day of a single fainting and dying soldier. Not only history, in which all ages and nations bleed, but our common newspapers and way of speaking, and the scientific appearance of warlike preparations for surgical assistance, change wounds into words, and the monstrous amount of suffering into letters. Hence, the same minister who tranquilly observes the hygrometer of war's bloody rain, and cheerfully orders a bath of blood for two nations, is overcome by the wounds and tears of a stage play, merely because the poet's art transforms the words back to their living meaning. A prince whose tendencies you feared might be conducted over a bloody battle-field with the same warning advantage as accrues to children of a different class who are led through a hospital. But God grant that humanity may ever fail to offer such schools and such remedies!

Properly—and this might be instructively said to a prince—the people only should decide upon war with another nation, that is, upon a return to the first state of nature; especially as they only gather its bitter, not its sweet, fruits; and should determine whether they are willing to give themselves up as a sacrifice to the storms and tempests of war. It is a crying sin against Heaven that one king, for an offensive expression from another king, should involve two nations in mortal strife. In reading modern history one shudders to see how the merest trifles have kindled the fires of war; how a woman's pin, or an ambassador's finger, has been the conductor of a thunder-storm ravaging whole countries. The wars of modern times ought certainly to strike soldiers only, not the ranks of unarmed citizens. When the more active part of the latter disturb the operations of the former, as in shooting from houses, they at once appeal to the right of distinction, and proceed to attack and punish them; but why should the unarmed classes, without the advantages, yet participate in all the sufferings, plunder, imprisonment, &c., of those who are armed? One or all of these three remedies must be applied to this terrible coil, in order that the future may atone for the past: either that naval conflicts may be carried on without letters of marque, and that in land fights the soldiers may be placed in some desert, as the scene of their many-voiced and many-handed duel; or that, as in republics which have fallen to destruction or risen to an unearthly life, every citizen should be a soldier, and consequently every soldier a citizen; or, finally, that the eternal banner of peace should hang down from heaven, and flutter in the pure ether above the earth.

I have an idea that either you, or one of your friends, once declared that history—the long war report and bulletin of humanity—imparted the infection of war to young princes. But I would almost trust to it as the remedy for the love of war. Charles XII. of Sweden could scarcely have imbibed his passion for glory and conquest from the mere perusal of Curtius's Life of Alexander, since Alexander had the same passion without having read his biography; and, Cæsar, also, without knowing more of Curtius than his hero. In history may be found the test of the anchors and swords of sea and land fights. It alone shows to the monarch, thirsting for glory, how little mere bravery appertains to glory; for a cowardly nation is more rare upon the earth than a brave man. What nation, in ancient or modern times, is not brave? At present, for instance, all Europe is so; Russians, Danes, Swedes, Austrians, English, Hessians, French, Bavarians, and Prussians, all are brave. The lower Rome's free spirit sank, the more wildly and vehemently rose the merely brave spirit; Catiline, Cæsar, Augustus, had conquerors for their servants. The frequent arming of the ancient slaves, as of the modern beggars, testifies against the value of the common bravery of fists and wounds. Iphicrates, the Athenian, said that the best soldiers were those who loved plunder and violence; and General Fischer has added to these, vagabonds. Cannot a monarch wish to shine upon posterity with something else than the showy tiger-spots of a conqueror, in which the Timurs, Attilas, Dessalines, and other scourges of God, or knouts of the devil, outdo him? How coldly does one walk in history over the countless battle-fields which fill the earth with beds of death! And with what curses does one hasten past the crown which, like the ajutage, or leaden head of a pipe raised by the upward gushing of a fountain, is only kept up by starting streams of blood! But where an eternal glory hovers round some heroes, as those of Marathon's plain and Thermopylæ's pass, there other spirits fought and fell,—heavenly visions of the courage of freedom. And whatever individual stands greatly forth in history and fills its spaces, does it not from any pyramid of skulls erected on battle-fields; but a great soul hovers there, like the form of an unearthly world glorified in the night, and touches the stars and the earth.

For there is a nobler courage, which once, though not long, Sparta, Athens and Rome possessed; the courage of peace and of freedom, the bravery which showed itself at home. Many a nation, a cowardly slave in its own country but a bold hero out of it, resembles the falcon (though become tame, unlike it, rather by sleeping than by sleeplessness) which is carried hooded on the wrist of the falconer, until left to its ancient freedom, a momentary wooer of the air, it boldly and bravely vanquishes some new bird and then returns with it to the slavish earth. But the truly, because freely, brave people carries on its war of freedom at home, against every hand which would stay its flight or blind its eye; this, indeed, is the longest and bravest war, and the only one which admits no truce. Just so brave, and in a higher sense, may a monarch be. Let the great ideal of art, to unite dignity with repose, be the ideal of the throne. To extinguish the flames of war is more worthy of a king, as it is more difficult, than to kindle them. If this bravery of peace be already secured, whereby alone a monarch can distinguish himself in history—then that of war, if necessary, becomes easy, and every wound glorious. Hence, the great men of antiquity are rather distinguished by their character than by their deeds, rather by the trophies of peace than those of war: the plough-heroes of battle-fields by an intensity of love, which, as in Phocion, sowed the steep cliffs which bound the mighty ocean with balmy spice plants; which in Cato the younger loved and bewailed his brother with all a woman's tenderness, and caused Epamirondas to remember the duties of a host even on the scaffold; which made Brutus a tender husband, Alexander a trustful friend, and Gustavus a Christian.

It seems to me that a young prince should view the future, which he helps to form, from this side and through this opening in history; in this manner he must learn to subject the inferior to the nobler kind of courage. Certainly a king who avoided war from cowardice would be more dangerous—especially in the present position of Germany—than one who sought it from fool-hardiness; and, moreover, he would be less easily cured. The sceptre resembles Saturn's scythe, which is at once the emblem of harvest time and of death.

The thing that grieves me when I consider the excellence of the education you, dear Adelhard, impart, is that it will be of little or no use, unless you are ennobled, or unless the prince might remain at home. I mean this; I cannot but lament that he must grasp the pilgrim's staff before the sceptre, and must pass through the three kingdoms of nature, or three courts of the grand tour, Italy, England and France, in order to return different from what he started! Enough cannot be said in favour of travel, but not of early travel. Let the man, not the boy, travel; let his travelling-cap be the crown. If he go uncrowned, sent as a travelling fortune to the fair of Paris, we know—by the example of his noble companions—what, not to speak of ruined health, he will bring back; namely, a mind full of contempt for his little inland patrimony, full of plans for miniature imitations, and of acquired notions whose importation the Prussian Lycurgus and the Spartan Frederick the Second prevented, the one into the nobility, the other into the people, by forbidding travelling. If we wish, by imitation, to give the dominion over our domestic affairs to foreign countries, which by treaties of peace—those of Westphalia and Luneville, for instance—have already quite sufficiently ruled and changed the constitution of the Germanic empire, I really think we burden ourselves with too great a weight of gratitude, especially when we consider the rareness of the opportunities for requital. If foreign travel is indispensable to mental growth why do we see so few Dauphins, so few Princes of Wales, of Asturia, or of Brazil, in our hotels? If the coat of worldly varnish given by strangers cannot be done without, fortunately his court will be so frequently visited by so many who will gladly linger there a long time that he may easily remain at home. For the same reason, among the artisans of Berlin, Königsberg and other large towns, the sons of master workmen are not required to travel like other journeymen.

But there is one country which an heir-apparent may minutely survey in his travels—it is his own; and the deeper he penetrates into the lower classes the more productive of benefit will his journey be. Like an Æneas, or a Dante, he will return a wiser man out of this lower world into the upper regions of the throne. A prince cannot picture to himself hunger as any thing other than a rare gift of God and of the stomach; or labour, than as a hawking-match to procure it; or the people, which experiences enough of both, as any thing different from the pampered crowd of his court servants. If in Corea the people must shut their doors and windows when the king is passing by, we may be sure that he will also close his from the eyes of his people: and so one invisibility produces the other.

If he be crowned and married, and about as old or even older than Joseph II., or Peter the Great, or Popes on their travels, or the ancient Romans, whose proconsulships were also journeys, he will receive greater advantage from his travels than he would even as his own ambassador; for he will see every thing more accurately, more quickly, and be less taxed for doing so. Bolingbroke tells us that if at forty we read again some of our childhood's books we shall find every thing new: even so, if at the same age we revisit the land of our youth, we shall find a new world previously overlooked. A young prince, perhaps, brings home with him out of some foreign country a faded garland, as a memento of rare flowers of happiness; a prince of mature age brings also the seeds of those flowers. When the warm-hearted, manly, true German duke of Meiningen travelled, the year before his death, to one of the southern cities of Germany, he did not visit courts, balls, princes and women; but machines, manufactories, soup-kitchens, mines, artists and their works, financiers and their tables—ah! why was he doomed so shortly afterwards to make the longest journey to the most distant country? A noble prince who loves his people can never tread that path too late. But, if your Friedanot must go on his travels before he ascends the throne, I would wish you to be ennobled and to accompany him. Every royal tutor should receive nobility from his connection with a prince, just as iron becomes magnetic by contact with a magnet, in order that he may afterwards be employed at the dinner or card-table, when, otherwise, his place must be occupied by some one whose rank admits him to the royal table. How happy is a princess whose Orbilia and La plus Bonne is, from the commencement, of such high rank that she may ever remain near her! “Turba medicorum perdidit Cæsarem.” * this epitaph on Adrian is also true of the multitude of “soul curers.”

Many of your regulations for princes may be readily guessed, because they must also have a place in the education of every child; only that qualities which the latter must use as small coin in every-day life, are required from princes as gold for the mint and for the adornment of the palace. In the first place I rank keeping his word. Princes rarely break their word, except to whole countries; their own and foreign lands. The word given to one man, themselves perhaps excepted, they always keep. Chamfort remarks that, up to the ministry of the Cardinal de Loménie, fifty-six public breaches of faith were reckoned in Henry IV. These may readily be explained by the rarefying power of space, which, far more than time, immediately decomposes the strongest powers; as, for instance, electricity, attraction, philanthropy, freedom, and a promise. Distance, for instance, inconceivably diminishes British freedom even in Ireland, as it formerly did in North America; but at sea and in the colonies, it is, by distance, rarefied to such a degree that only the quick eye of a captain or a nabob can distinguish it from absolute slavery. In the same way a promise is so weakened by distance that even a peace concluded a century or so before, by the naval powers of Europe, could not avert war from India. Physics, as already said, show the cause of this phenomenon. This fact, perhaps, renders a lecture-room and teacher for speaking truth more necessary to an heir-apparent. Indeed, this speech is quite as important as the Lusatian or Italian, which, according to the golden bull,* every future elector, king of Bohemia, and pfalz-graf of the Rhine, had to learn in his seventh year: or even as the French, though no bull has declared that essential.

* “The multitude of doctors killed Cæsar.”

Royal truthfulness towards his own and other nations is not only, as others have said, a monarch's highest policy, but also, and for that very reason, the most difficult. Upright minds are like straight roads, which seem to the eye scarce half so long as those which wind artfully about; but their true length is found by a nearer examination. Only a prince who cherishes noble and well considered desires will choose to reveal them; as it is only cut diamonds of the purest water which can be set so that the light may shine through.

Under all treaties of war and peace there lies a higher bond of union than power—because without it they could not even be formed—it is reliance on a given word, on the power of character, not on land and sea forces. But in history, which else accurately lays before us from month to month the cost of the new triumphal arches for fresh victors, there is nothing more rare than an honourable niche devoted to a king who speaks truly for the present, and prophesies truly for the future. Royal truthfulness presupposes force of character, resolute courage and just strength of will. Finally, where this oak forest stands and grows around a throne, there is the ancient German sanctuary; the throne within its shadow work miracles, and the people round its base pray to heaven for protection. You and I hear such a forest rustling so near our study that we could count its leaves.

Baireuth, January 1806.

I have again unpacked my goods because peace continues; so that our meeting, as well as the review and raification of my predictions, must be postponed to a more favourable season. In conclusion, and in jest, I append a few aphorisms on education suitable for insertion in albums, which I prepare from time to time for the various royal and noble tutors who visit my study, so as to have a few useful impromptu thoughts ready to be written down when they hand me their albums. The following thoughts have not yet been inserted in such books:—

* Aur. Bull. c. 30. § 2.

To form a brave man, educate boldly! Brave painters alone, says Lavater, can hit a brave face.

Not without reason do the rarest flowers borrow their names from princes. Power cannot have too gentle an expression. The look of a king is itself a deed. Consequently a king can choose whether he will all day kill or make alive.—The sceptre should not be a rod of authority; but, like a magnetic needle, should assume the form of a lily.—It is easier, like the tragic Crebillon, to obtain the surname of the terrible, than, like Virgil, to merit the epithet of the maidenly.—A flute lay side by side in his tent with Frederick the Great's baton of command. Let every prince regard this as an allegory.*

He who mistrusts humanity is quite as often deceived as he who trusts men. The wicked and despotic favourite always advises a king to rule for himself, not to let others govern for him; to see and hear for himself (at least to see and hear the favourite), and not to be a mere repeater on which an external hammer strikes the time, but to be a church bell, which sounds with its own tongue, and which the favourite rings whether for funerals or weddings.

Have at heart no work of your pupil so much as love of work; it is this he should learn by that. And, unless he learn to be a lover of work, he will in after years (as Vopiscus tells us the Emperor Carinus did) keep a servant to write his signature; or, if he write it himself, he will do so like that self-made slave of his own servants, Philip the Fifth of Spain.

* Since these four thoughts only express a fifth, which is the same, they will be inserted in four different albums.

On the throne everything, even time—as in Basle—is wanted to be an hour earlier than it really is: thought, consequently, long before reflection. Royal impromptus, as the winged seeds of action, are always dangerous; they often make long diets and long judgment-days necessary, and have to count forced imposts instead of freely granted tributes. How many subjects has a bon mot killed! How many suggestions of the wicked one have been acted on by haste! He who needs proofs has but to inquire of the chief justice in history. What more excellent object, I ask, can a teacher set before himself than to accustom his pupil never to say an important yes or no, never to express a like or a dislike, without taking an hour's respite to consider the question, request, or sin? With such a letter of grace (moratorium) he might write himself a brevet of infallibility. But why speak I of princes? Every one is in this position; only that the high rank of monarchs fearfully increases the rolling, avalanche-like, consequences of every sound. And it is precisely in the higher ranks that men perversely attend more to deeds expressed in words—bon mots, impromptus, &c., than to words expressed in deeds—decreets, resolutions, &c.; and take time to consider a jest, though not a serious matter. Let the teacher invert this inversion. . . . Dear Adelhard, I am myself this moment guilty of improvising; so difficult is it to be avoided. For this last article for the album I really made for the letter; the former would require it to be much more compressed. So powerful is the influence of the present moment; one confounds letter, album, and book all together. Fare you well, dear Adelhard; and, in this respect, fare better than I.

I wished to add this apophthegm also: "Above all things inspire a prince with the taste for reading—not merely the inscriptions on triumphal arches and in illuminations—but books and acts;" but, if I am not mistaken, it is already written in your album. Cabinet secrets, like the light of the fixed stars, reach us for the first time many years after their emanation; but the secrets of the study, like the light of the planets, never reach so far as the fixed stars.

Yours,

J. P. F. R.

Postscript.—As there was no post, this letter to you, excellent prince's tutor, has lain in my desk during the sale of the whole first edition of Levana; it was printed, but not despatched: luckily, while preparing the second, a young tutor, dismissed from a certain court, visited me and promised to deliver you my letter. For the rest he curses the whole matter for hours every day, and declares he would almost rather be a prince than a prince's tutor; for the one only spoils himself, whereas the tutor spoils others too. He openly derides my whole letter to you, as a mere waste of paper and ink, and says I have only forgotten the principal thing, the so-called governor both of prince and tutor. He asked me to teach him "what use it was to be the very best of tutors, as a man must become the very worst if the prince's governor so choose; who is regarded as the upper-house to the tutor's lower-house, or college rector to his inferior school." But, instead of waiting my instructions, he continued angrily: "The governors, who never permitted him even to be vice-governor to the prince, were as old in rank as in age, and consequently took precedence in every thing of him, who was only perfectly capable of all his duties; so that the young prince regarded him merely as a subordinate, as a kind of school-fox whose master Reynard was the governor. The word of a man who sat at the same dinner table with the prince was more esteemed by him and by the whole court, than the sermons of one who might only sit near him at the study table."

I replied, that on this matter I would take the part of the men of the world. The schoolman has about as much relation to the nobleman as the Abbot Fowler, for instance, has to a fowl. As, according to Kant's observations, we soon grow weary of the most excellent human singing, but never of the perpetual singing of birds, because it is subject to no rule, and its variations are quite undetermined; so, the scholar, by the monotonous unity of his thoughts and discourses, always aiming at one end, soon drives to sleep; whereas the courtier, flitting from one subject to another, engages the attention, just because he says nothing very definite, and because variety of mere nothings gives more pleasure than uniformity of something.

"A governor," continued he, "who only thinks of king, court and nobility, and orders the prince to be educated only for these, will bar with the collars of his multitudinous orders all the havens into which a tutor would conduct his pupil to the sound of silver flutes. He will throw in his teeth the accurate 'revision' of his plan of education (none so good as that which is printed); and, if the tutored tutor think differently, he has only the choice of being frightened, or being angry."

"Truly, not bad!" said I, "for by this means the tutor will be educated to be tender and better than he can educate the prince. In the same way, cooks make poultry tender and tasty by putting them into a pond, or a turkey by throwing it from a considerable height before killing it—this has the effect of fright on them; or they irritate them by whistling and shaking red cloths at them—which has the effect of rage."

"We must then experience," concluded the tutor, "what is the consequence if the governor can use the sceptre as a good school cane to the citizen-teacher: I do not mean what the governor becomes (for he goes away like myself), but what the innocent prince becomes, in whom, placed as a young master between a flattering upper servant and a kneeling slave, no manly character can possibly be developed,—no bones grow."

"But," said I, "I do not see the evil of that. I myself know many people of rank whose whole inner man does not contain one whole bone, but who precisely resemble people struck by a thunder-bolt, in whom the lightning generally only breaks the bones, without in the smallest degree burning or injuring the external form. And so it is, my friend!"

As, however, we could neither of us quite agree, and I could not become perfectly serious, I think I have adopted a very sensible plan in sending him to you with this postscript, so that you may either alter or confirm his opinion. You must certainly know whether there is any difference among governors, and whether the course of the little prince may not occasionally describe an accurate ellipse round the two foci. Heaven grant that, and many other things too!

SIXTH FRAGMENT.

ON THE MORAL EDUCATION OF BOYS.

CHAP. I. Moral Strength,—Physical Strength.—Games of Hurting.—Injuriousness of Fear and of Fright.—Love of Life—Insufficiency of the mere Passions.—Necessity of a youthful Ideal, § 101—108. CHAP. II. Truthfulness, Charades, and Children's Plays, § 109—113. CHAP. III. Education of the Affections.—Means of arousing them.—Love of Animals, § 114—119. CHAP. IV. Supplemental Appendix on Moral Education.—Various Consolatory Rules.—Stories of Parents for their own Children.—Children's Journeys.—Danger of a premature Feeling of Shame, and on the Modesty of Children, § 120—127.

CHAPTER I.

§ 101.

HONOUR, honesty, steadfast will, truthfulness, indifference towards threatening wounds and endurance of those inflicted, openness, self-respect, just self-appreciation, contempt for the opinion of the world, justice and perseverance—all these and similar words indicate only one half of the moral nature, viz. moral strength and elevation of character. The other half embraces all our connections with others; the realm of love, gentleness, benevolence—in short, what may be called moral beauty.

If the one seem to turn inwards, towards itself, the other outwards, towards others: the one to be revelling, the other an attracting pole; if the one regard an idea as holy, and the other rather esteem life to be so, yet both are equally elevated above self, which is only the object of the animal propensities, and of the sins against the twin stars of the heart; for honour, as well as love, sacrifices selfishness. Moreover love does not seek and contemplate in another what it avoids in itself; but it beholds and embraces therein the image of the divinity. We find God twice; once within, once without us; within us as an eye, without us as light. Yet is it everywhere the same ethereal fire, indifferent whether it spring up from without or within; and, indeed, the one presupposes the other, and consequently a third which produces and unites both. Call it the Holy. In the spiritual world there is properly no out and no in. Love is naturally the companion of true moral strength, as we ever find sweet fruits on strong branches; weakness trembles like a Vesuvius only to destroy. Even so, pure love can not merely do all, but is all.

§ 102.

But here we are only concerned with the difference of appearances, not with their foundations. The former show us man born and fitted out more for moral strength, or honour, and woman for moral beauty, or love. From our former position, "that woman does not divide and contemplate herself as man does," we might deduce the division of the two moral poles, with varying balance between both sexes, ascribing love to the female and strength to the male, because the former is more occupied with what is external to herself, but the latter in examining what passes within himself. But why reason about facts? This moral difference between the sexes is repeated, although in miniature, in every individual; but more of this hereafter. We will now view the educational means of adapting the boy to his destination by developing moral strength of character.

§ 103.

One age requires men in order to exist, another in order to subsist; ours needs both; and yet education dreads nothing more than making boys manly, and, where possible, strives to unman them. Nurseries and schoolrooms are like altars in the temples which the Romans dedicated to Pavor and Pallor (pale fear). As though the world were now too full of courage, teachers ordinarily engraft fear by punishments and actions, but only recommend courage by words. Not undertaking, but letting alone, receives the victor's crown.

In Nestor's order of battle* the timid occupied the middle ranks; it is so also in our states; and more physical courage is found in the highest and lowest ranks than the scholar or the schoolmaster usually possesses. Hence the latter expects his boys to resemble the Iroquois, who think a hare is a deity; and even endeavours to raise them to a place among these gods. The ancients, in their veneration for strength, forgot benevolence; we err in the contrary direction. The effeminate teaching-class may, however, be excused by its disappointment; for the courage of children, owing to their deficiency in counterbalancing prudence, readily turns to rashness and attacks teacher and fate. But let us remember that years do indeed increase light but not strength, and that it is easier to provide a pilgrim on life's journey with a guide, than to restore to him, like a statue, the legs and wings which have been removed lest he should run or fly away. We will, like warriors, begin with common courage, and proceed upwards to honour.

§ 104.

The body is the coat of mail and breastplate of the soul; so let this in the first place be hardened into steel by heat and cold. Let every father provide, as well as he can, a little gymnastic school round his house; the very street in which the boy plays, runs, falls, climbs, and bids defiance, is something. Wounds got in the street are sooner healed and more wholesome than wounds got at school, and they teach better how to bear pain. Out of the wild English youth there grows a ~~strong~~ member of Parliament; as out of the early Roman robbers a virtuous self-sacrificing senate arose. The Romans bled the rashly brave; the schoolmaster's rod also lets blood; and the starving method, solitary confinement &c., pales the remainder. No power should ever be weakened,—one cannot repeat this too often— but only its counterbalancing power strengthened: in squirrels the upper row of teeth often grows painfully long, but only when the lower one is lost. A rash twelve-year-old Dreadnought might soon enough be made thoughtful; you need but read through with him some anatomical or surgical book, but this remedy, like arsenic, is only to be used in the most desperate cases and in the smallest possible doses. Bodily weakness makes mental weakness; and mental weakness leaves deeper, aye, perpetual, traces behind it: the broken arm is much sooner cured than the broken heart of a child. And, lastly, children are spoiled in two different ways in the young sick-room; the healthy by severity, the sick by weak indulgence. Now the sick would be much better served by the mental excitement of pictures, little games on the pillow and tales, than by physical indulgences. If health be the first step to courage, bodily exercise is the second against pain. This in modern times is not only abandoned, but actually contradicted; and with us the boy is fastened up, not that he may learn but that he may not learn to bear it, and that he may at once begin to confess. Detestable method!

* Hom. II. iv. 297.

How can the torture-system of the punishing police so far confuse your ideas with regard to education, that you do not value the power of mental strength as opposed to physical strength, but consider firmness a repetition of the denounced fault? This is as egregious a mistake as Locke's advice to disgust children with card-playing by compelling them to practise it; for this official change, produced by disgust at the compulsory repetition of the game, would be a worse disease than that it cured. Must we not, in this place, severely attack another error in education—a most repulsive one, though concealed by the ~~showy~~ ^{showy} ~~name~~ of custom—it is that of harshly punishing children before other children, in order to make them a so-called example? For either the child, as a cold observer, shares the sentiments of the passionate punisher and feels no compassion for the torture-wrung cries of his equal, no disgust at the repulsive sight of the cruelly used victory of the strong over the weak,—and then, indeed, I know not what more his heart can lose,—or else the child experiences all the pain which the judgment-seat raised in the nursery inflicts, and so, as is the case with grown-up people at executions, thinks the punishment greater than the fault,—and then any advantage to be derived from the painful sight is lost; or, lastly, he at once pities and comprehends the punishment, and feels the greatest dread of such terrible pain,—and then you certainly do secure obedience, but you increase fear. In short, do not inflict severe punishments in the presence of children; be satisfied that their invisibility, coupled with what is related of them, will secure the advantages without the disadvantages.

It would be much more desirable to establish exercises in bearing pain, schools of the cross in a stoic sense; and indeed boys themselves have games of a similar nature. Formerly in Mexico one child bound his arm to that of another child, and placed a live coal between; both contended who should longest bear the burning pain. In Montaigne's childhood the nobility considered fencing-schools mean because, by their aid, victory no longer depended solely on courage. The ancient Danes did not even wink the eye at wounds in the face.* What was formerly attained by whole nations and, consequently, was not the gift of birth but of education,—this surely must be sufficiently easy to repeat in individuals.

Never make lamentation over a child's hurt, but pass it off with a joke. If a little child runs to you to show its hurt, let him wait a little before he engages your eye or ear, and in the mean time say quietly to him, "I must first finish my writing," or "knit off this needle." Or tell him to go and fetch you something; nothing draws the thorn from the wound so soon as action: soldiers do not feel their wounds in the heat of battle. "My nose is bleeding," says the youngest child in a distressful tone. "Oh! look at the pretty red blood, how it drops; whence does it come from? There was none in your little nose just now," you say; and the pain is forgotten in the inquiry

* Bibliothèque universelle, xv. 385.

—what is internal in what is external. Further: protect a child's ear even more carefully than his eye. The ear is especially the sense of fear; hence those animals which hear quickly are timid. As harmony holds the heart entranced in delight, so does the scream of fear in horror. An inexplicable sound is the true night for fear. The eye becomes at last reconciled to every monstrous form, if it only remain sufficiently long before it; but the abyss of sound does not become clearer, but more dreadful, by continuance. A little girl, to whom the colour of the chimney-sweeper had only seemed curious, received the first fright in her life from hearing the uninterrupted noise of his sweeping. Give therefore to every strange noise, such as that of the wind, some merry name. Our age is the first that has made it a duty to devise rules against that fear which disarms and fetters mankind. In every child there lies, side by side with the romantic hope of an infinite Heaven, the equally romantic dread of an infinite Orcus. But you hold this Orcus dreadfully open before the child if you give this ideal fear an object by naming such a thing. The author committed this error by saying to his children, in order to prevent their hating and fearing soldiers or other people, "Only bad men are to be feared." Hereby their fear, previously scattered over various visible objects, was concentrated in the unchanging focus of a single invisible object; and they carried this fancied bug-bear with them every where, and saw it in every thing. In no emotion of the soul—not even in love—does fancy push its creative and ruling power so far as in fear. Children, else religiously believing all their parents say, anxiously desire the word which is to arm them against ghosts, and yet, with that very dictum on their lips, succumb to imagination in their hearts. Further: children who have long since examined, and even themselves made, the object of their alarm—the cloak, for instance, and a hat hung upon a stick—will yet run away from it with terror. So they fear less what has already hurt them than what their parents, either by looks or words, have mentioned with fear; a mouse, for instance. Therefore, especially avoid and guard against all suddenness of speech,—such as exclaiming in the night, "Look!" or even "Listen!" which alarms yet more—and of appearance or action; for in that case the senses do not restrain, but only inflame, the fancy, and the reality is wildly confused by the hasty explanation. Thus, alarm during thunderstorms principally arises from the rapidity with which the lightning momentarily reveals the dark sky to the straining sight. If the whole firmament remained one long flash we should fear it less.

Do not merely spare children reading any painful stories, but also every verbal description of any unknown physical suffering; for in children of a lively imagination mental fear easily springs out of bodily fear, and this—which is never considered— even through dreams. These gigantic chaotic painters in the mind form, out of the little terrors of the day, those monstrous masks of the Furies which wake and nourish the fear of ghosts which slumbers in every human being. We should attend far more to the dreams of children than to those of mature persons, especially on account of this difference,—that in ours resound the echoes of our childhood; what then in theirs?— Who has not experienced sudden presentiments, an inexplicable and perfectly unexpected fore-taste of approaching good or ill fortune, wafted upon him like air from some mountain precipice? Or who in new countries, occurrences, or men, has not sometimes found, deep within him, a mirror whereon, from old time, these very things were darkly pictured and beheld? And to whom, in subsequent dreams and fevers, has not the same serpent form, the same mis-shapen tortuous monster, continually re-appeared, of which, in his whole remembered life, he had beheld no archetype? Might not these shapes be buried remnants of old childhood's dreams which rise from the deep, like sea-monsters, in the night?

Be careful to conceal your own grief about others' necessities or your own. Nothing is more infectious than fear and courage; but the parent's fear is doubled in the child; for where the giant trembles the dwarf must surely fall.

The father especially should never come before his children with a melancholy, penitential face, or the appearance of much suffering, as if there were so much to lose in life that he could even lose himself: at most let him only point out a gloomy future, but not anxiety concerning it; and at least let him have no other copies of his lamentations and "liber tristium" than one for his wife and friend. Yet the very opposite of this is most generally the case. It is in the house (as though every barricade and city wall must make people cowardly), in some hole in the shore, that the externally armed lobster casts his shell: and it is in the nest with its poor little ones that the bold eagle moults, thus permitting them only to see its domestic cowardice, not its public courage. Rather let every one resemble the pastor Seider, who, in reading the newspapers, lamented that of all the printed accounts of his sufferings not one was true.

§ 105.

Since indifference to actual blows, and disregard of anticipated ones, mutually strengthen each other,* I hope I may continue to confound them without reproach. Courage does not consist in blindly overlooking danger, but in meeting it with the eyes open. Therefore do not attempt to make boys brave by saying "It will not hurt you,"—for in that case the sheep would fight as bravely as the lion;—but by saying more truly, "What is it? Only a hurt." For you may safely reckon on a something in the human breast which no wounds can reach, on a steadfast celestial axle among the mutable earthly axles; insomuch as man, unlike the beasts, has something more than pain to dread.

There is a courage manifested against the future and the imagination, and also a courage manifested against the present and the imagination: the one is opposed to fear, the other to terror. If there must be the one or the other, fear's, for children, preferable to terror, but not so ~~for~~ for men! If fear, as the Cardinal de Retz said, enfeeble and distort the understanding more than all the other emotions of the mind, terror entirely deströys it, and puts madness in its place. Fear may be imparted so slowly and in so carefully measured doses, that it will rather act as an incitement than as a poison to thought and resolution. Whereas terror—whether inspired by sight or sound—is a flash of lightning shivering the whole man, unarming and slaughtering him at one stroke. Chiarugi* shows, on the authority of Giasone, that children who have been brought up harshly and kept in order by images of terror frequently fall victims to insanity.

* Not however exactly as one might assume; if a boy only have a quick fancy he will fear the wounds of the future whilst he disregards those of the present.

One shock of terror may produce long-lasting fear; but fear cannot give birth to terror, for its imagination, dwelling on the future, finds even its present there.

With the exception of good health, there is no preservative from terror save acquaintance with its object it is produced only by what is new. The bravest may be terrified, as the Romans were by elephants, or as the bravest modern European might be by some strange gigantic beast-like form—dropped out of Jupiter, let us suppose—whose poisonous qualities and modes of attack he knew not.

• Then arm the young mind against the thunder-storms of accident by a lightning conductor which you yourself make. The present assembly hall for the sittings of colleges and societies of learned men unfortunately helps them to pass through their sitting mode of life and death without becoming remarkably brave. It is a significant fact, that all important offices are marked by the appendage of a seat,—the Bench of judges and of bishops, the Chair of divinity, the Stool of prayer, the Seat of instruction, — and their reward is Rest in Abraham's bosom, or on the Thrones of the twelve apostles. He who sits when attacked by an enemy loses his courage, as is shown by every regiment awaiting an attack: and we run away with our heels, where alone the Homeric Achilles was vulnerable. But even in modern times the runner would be brave if no inimical runner pursued him. No Napoleon could spend sufficient money in building golden bridges for a flying enemy.

As a person can be really terrified only once by the same thing, I think it possible to spare children the reality by sportive representations of alarming circumstances. For instance: I go with my little nine-year-old Paul to walk in a thick wood. Suddenly three blackened and armed ruffians rush out and fall upon us, because I had hired them for the adventure with a small thieves' premium the day before. We two are only provided with sticks, but the band of robbers are armed with swords and a pistol without bullets. Here nothing is of use but presence of mind and resolution. One is opposed to three (for Paul must be reckoned as nothing, though I call upon him to fight); but because I turn away the pistol so that it may miss me, and strike the dagger out of one of the thieves' hand with my stick, and seize upon it to attack the third, I hope that the ruffianly troop may be vanquished and put to flight by one honest man with his son's help. We pursue the routed army for a little distance, but soon desist as many stray shots are fired; and I maintain a constant derision of the enemy's line,—which, like an orderly book-shelf, only shows the backs—so that even my little ally can conclude for himself how much courage alone is superior to numbers, especially of villains, who, according to all experience, are seldom brave. But (I add in this second edition) all such games are of doubtful advantage, because of their falsity; and only by repetition can they altogether lose the evils attendant even on a fright which ends in nothing. A great many tales of victorious courage are, perhaps, better means of arousing and strengthening that virtue.

* See his work on Insanity, b. i. § 282.

Other "cloak and dagger pieces," as Bouterwek tells us the Spaniards call their intriguing comedies, might be tried advantageously in the night, in order to bring the fancies, inspired by a belief in ghosts, to common every-day light; at the same time I admit that there is always a deep-seated fear of this kind, which only God, or the next world, can thoroughly remove. Even the fear of storms cannot be altogether eradicated, at least by reasoning; the tranquillity, or, still better, the cheerfulness of grown-up persons during them is the best cure. Since what is uncommon is most dreaded it may perhaps be numbered among the few advantages of a town-educ-tion, that in it the eye and ear of a child become indifferent to more objects than they can do in a village. In nothing, fear itself scarcely excepted, does a man make such rapid advances as in courage. Night marches, the alliance of many boys—for company increases courage as well as fear—and finally the histories of true heroes, such as Charles XII. of Sweden, rivet the shield of courage more and more firmly on the breast.

§ 106.

Permit me still to add a few ingredients to the tonic medicines of manliness, ere I pass to the mental means of strengthening it. The following reflections may stand in the same relation as branches to the top of a tree.

What, from the Fakcer to the martyrs of Christianity, of love, of duty, and to those who sacrificed their lives for liberty, has vanquished pain, opinion, desire, torture?—One Ruling Idea in the heart. Implant, then, in the boy some such living idea, were it but that of honour, and he is fit to become a man. Every fear may be overcome by placing it clearly before him.

Every child pictures to himself some position, some trade, as the work- and sorrow-dwelling of life, and some other (usually his father's) as the look-out spot or belvidere of hope. Take from him these erroneous charts of heaven and hell, which, like warrants of arrest, disarm and render him the prisoner of fear and of desire. Bring him—not by dead listening, but by living observation—to a knowledge of the happiness of the most various conditions, so that he may look upon life as on the level ground of a pleasure encampment, where even the slave has pitched his tent. It is much more important that a child should not causelessly dread and avoid any condition, however gloomy, than that he should not hopefully desire and labour after any, even the most brilliant; for hope leaves us more understanding and more happiness than fear. In order to extract from the tear-press of compassion some feeling and pence for a beggar, you choose to crush a power which could sustain itself on the beggar's pallet! What else do you do than cause the little shocked creature to prefer making a hundred beggars in after life, to being one himself, and perhaps giving something to some other? Always let oneness of purpose rule over a boy: he wanted, perhaps, to have, or to do, some certain thing; oblige him, then, to take or to do it. And never command any thing twice.

Raise up in him by every possible means the conception of a higher tribunal than that of feeling. If he desire any forbidden thing, do not move it further from but rather nearer to him, so that he may overcome that desire by the sense of duty. Place your command simply before him, without any attractive concomitants which may make it seem lighter than it is; for, by this delicate concealment of the rule, chance, which accustoms to nothing, is made master. The manner in which the command is obeyed is of infinitely more importance than the mere fulfilment of it. Neither veil a refusal, as mothers are too apt to do; perpetual concealments are impossible. Why will you not spare yourself by a plain No, and accustom your boy to cheerful resignation? Quiet submission to arbitrary despotism weakens the character, but to necessity strengthens it; be then a fate to your child! A child's obedience, without other consideration, can be of no advantage to himself, for how if he obeyed all the world? But it is the motive to it, as reverential loving trust, and the perception of necessity, which ennobles him. Those who are obedient only from fear become mechanical automata, hypocrites, flatterers, and are totally ungovernable when behind the back of their drivers.

You bend (or break) the young mind if, before the age of insight into political inequalities, you teach it to pay other respect than what is due to every human being and to age; unfettered by order-ribbons, blind to stars and gold, let the child regard both the servant and the master of his father with equal respect. A child is by nature a Diogenes to every Alexander, and a gentle Alexander to every Diogenes; let him continue so; never let enervating humility towards rank approach him.

Only great objects can worthily occupy a boy's heart; and what, except knowledge, can fill it better than the love of his country, even though broken in the diamond-mortar of the present age? This holy flame should be fanned in all schools, but certainly not after the method of Tyrtaeus, that is, by enthusiasm for a decrepit and justly fallen state, but by inspiration of the "Hermann's Battle" and "Order of Fire" of Klopstock. However, I scarcely expect this from the old humanists, who, in great poems, take most pleasure in that which is most palatable in the elephant—the feet.

No science has so many teachers as the science of happiness, or pleasure; as if this had not already planted its throne in the hearts of cats, vultures and, in short, of all other beasts. Will you then teach what the beasts know? Shall the human mind, like a Centaur, enter the world of mind with a body bearing the marks of the spur? For what reason—save a bad one—are the selfish excesses of children more indulged than those which display obstinacy, the love of eating more than the love of quarrelling, as if the teeth for tearing and those for chewing were not equally important? If you seek to inspire reverence for pure Worth, Justice, and Religion by any other means than the simple forms of these children of God,—were it merely by showing as an appendage some advantage thence derivable to the animal propensities, instead of teaching that they are due sacrifices to those goddesses,—then have you sullied the pure spirit, and made it little and hypocritical. You, like the cold north, have suffered the lions of the south to shrivel up into cats, its crocodiles into lizards.

If life is a battle, let the teacher be a poet, who may animate the boy to meet it with needful songs. Accustom him to regard his future, not as a path from pleasures (though innocent) to other pleasures: nor even as a gleanings, from spring time to harvest, of flowers and fruits; but as a time in which he must execute some long plan: in short, let him aim at a long course of activity, not of pleasure. Enjoyment soon wearies both itself and us; effort, never. That man is happy, for instance, who devotes his life to the cultivation of an island, to the discovery of one that is lost, or of the extent of the ocean. In London it is he who was born rich, not he who has made himself rich, that commits suicide; and, on the other side of the picture, it is not the poor man, but he who has become poor, that kills himself. The miser grows old enjoying rather than wearied of life; but the heir who comes into possession of his active gains sinks into ennui. So I would rather be the court gardener who watches and protects an aloe for fifteen years, until at last it opens to him the heaven of its blossom, than the prince who is hastily called to look at the opened heaven. The writer of a dictionary rises every morning like the sun to move past some little star in his zodiac; a new letter is to him a new year's festival, the conclusion of the old one a harvest-home; and, since after each capital letter the whole alphabet follows successively, the author on his paper may perhaps frequently celebrate on one and the same day a Sunday, a Lady-day, and a Crispin's holiday.

Do not fear the rise of the sentiment of honour, which is nothing worse than the rough husk of self-esteem, or the expanded covers of the tender wings which elevate above the earth and its flowers. But, to raise and ennoble that honour of the individual into honour of the race, and that again into honour for the worth of mind, never praise him who has gained a prize, but those who rank below him; give the honourable title, not as a distinction for the steps which have been mounted, but as a notification of neighbourhood to what is higher; and, lastly, let your praise afford more pleasure because you are pleased than the enjoyment of the distinction gives.

§ 107.

If man resemble iron in his strength, he also, by the inflammability of his passions, resembles that metal in connection with sulphur, at whose touch the hot bar of iron dissolves in drops. Does mere passion give strength? As certainly as a Parisian revolution gives freedom, or a comet bright comet-lighted nights; only they pass away again. The most powerful men of antiquity, the rulers or judges of their age, and the examples of all other ages, ever sprung from the Stoic school; passions served them only as supports during storms, not as the beam of a balance!

As with the strength, so it is with the light which passions, according to the declaration of Helvetius, ought to throw upon their objects; it is, forsooth, just as Chateaubriand says, that in storms rocks shine with the foam of the waves, and so warn off ships:—very dear, and very changeable, light-houses!

Admit your boy, then, as much as possible into the Stoic school; and that less by instruction than by the example of true Stoics of all ages. But that he may not mistake the Stoic for a lethargic Dutchman, or even a stupid savage, let him see that the true inner fire of the breast glows most intensely in those men who manifest through life a steadfast will, and not, like the slaves of passion, various isolated ebullitions and desires: and name to him such men as Socrates and Cato, who were animated by a constant, but therefore tranquil, inspiration.

§ 108.

This steadfast volition, which tranquillises every mental tumult, does not presuppose any mere single object, but the grand final aim of life—a high ideal—which is the central sun of all its revolutions. It serves, therefore, to produce a brave or great life; not a great or brave individual action: of this, indeed, every weakling is capable. And so it never presents the spectacle of a lonely mountain, though there are such upon the earth, but it resembles those continuous chains of mountain-like clouds we see in the sky.

An unchanging will can only aim at what is universal, at what is divine, be it freedom, or religion, or science, or art. The more divided the will is, the more is it liable to be disturbed by the outer world. As man—in opposition to the beasts, which only apprehend the single individuals presented to their senses—extends and resolves the known world into various species, and his thoughts into categories, so does the ideal concentrate the desires in one general all-embracing effort.

This ideal can be imparted by no education—for it is our very inmost self—but it must be presupposed, and so may be animated by all. Life is kindled only by life; and the highest life can only be called into existence in a child by example, whether present or historical, or, which unites both, by poetry.

The present living time cannot so easily purchase, or find, great men as little tin figures for children. But the distant history of the universe can furnish them to us:—we need but call to mind the soul-stirring contempt of life displayed in wars for freedom which would have immortalised Plutarch, had he been its historian, as certainly as his ancient heroes;—but it has found no Plutarch. Greatness, if not misrepresented, is yet forgotten; and so, in the midst of the best present time, we yet need the mighty past, as birds of passage do the moonshine, to fly into warm countries. Parents and teachers and a few acquaintances are, unfortunately, placed before the growing boy instead of the saints' images of the ideal—bad and useless! A lawgiver, or any man, who daily in the child's presence changes from dressing gown to dress coat, can never arouse that purest sentiment (such Chateaubriand considers wonder) in whose heights all the stars of the child's ideal move and shine. If children must pass behind the light of fair examples, why, O why, should you give them gloomy instead of glorious ones?

But Clio, the Muse of the past, stands by you, and calls her father Apollo to her assistance. Only fill the boy's mind with the glorified world of heroes, with lovingly painted pictures of great men of every kind, and his in-born ideal will not first be called to life in the midst of that work-a-day ideal which also sleeps in every one.

So let every poetic ideal shine free and bright before him; his eye will not thereby be blinded to two greater ideals,—to that which his own conscience commands him to be, and to the idea of God.

The educator, Campe, rightly recommends the illumined hemisphere of the present human race to be turned towards children: but certainly not that they may thereby learn patience towards the mediocre—impatience were better—but that the glory of the world, supposing it to come from dew-drops rather than jewels, may shine through their morning. What I consider dangerous—even more dangerous than the representation of man-devils,* as every child daily hears of their hellish master without injury—is, laying mixed characters before them from which to select those worthy of imitation; you might as well set a child to imitate his own similarly mixed nature. What else does a boy learn from that many-godded confederation-morality but to apply the easy balance between victory and defeat to himself? You might also apply much more closely the Gospel doctrine of forbearance towards human infirmities—namely, towards his own.

Much that is very plausible, and very prolix, will be urged against this idealisation of youth by pedagogic elephant hunters, who hunt down what is great in order to have it tame, serviceable, and toothless in their stables. “All this is very fine, but only fit for the world of romance. What can come out of such excessive straining of the young mind but a vain contemplation and useless opposition to the real world, by which, nevertheless, he must live, and which could scarcely be directed by the dreams of a visionary, or of a beardless boy? There are, to use the language of novel writers, neither Phoenixes nor Basilisks, but there are common land and water birds. In short, the young man must go forth into the world, as the old man has done, and learn to forget his empty giant images. Here again the middle is the right course; that is to say, the youth may be told that men may possibly become so and so; however, one must not be too critical if they do not, but live for the state in which one lives: and again, that those ideal notions are only of value and use in so far as they manifest those qualities in connection with the available reality; so, in a really allegorical sense, every scholar in Zurich, be he professor of divinity, law, or pedagogy, must yet be enrolled member of some guild, that of the shoemakers, weavers, or some other trade. And only thus, and not otherwise, can citizens be given to their country worthy of their parents and teachers."

* Yet this should be but rare; for it is dangerous even to think of the deeper crimes; but this granted, a child beholds without injury (for example) the worst, but to him already known, degrees of hatred, murder, &c.; but unheard of forms of murder do him harm, for the more strangely they horrify him, so much the more do they make him familiar with the small uprisings of emotion.

That last I admit. But, good heavens! would you, then, help to weaken what the age and the world weaken without your aid? You really act as if from after years, from the valley of life, gradual elevation, instead of depression, were to be expected, and men had not to issue forth and hasten over. Should you not treat the eyes of the mind at least as carefully as those of the body, before which at first you place the concave glasses which diminish in the smallest possible degree, because afterwards their use necessitates such as are more concave and diminish more? The worst that you labour to avoid is only that the youth should exalt some reality into his ideal; but the still worse thing that you endeavour to effect is, that he should darken and incorporate his ideal with reality. Oh! there is enough of that without you. The ripe sunflower no longer turns its heavy seed-laden head towards the sun. The Rhine soon finds its plain, through which it creeps with no glittering waterfalls, and bears its burdens to Holland. What is all the gain the young soul can obtain from the avoidance of a few false steps, compared with the tremendous loss of the holy fire of youth, of its high-soaring wings, its great plans, without which it creeps as nakedly into cold narrow life as most men creep out of it? How can life ripen without the ideal glow of youth, or wine without its August? The best that men have done, if it have come in the late season of life, has been but a late-growing seed which the tree of life in their childhood's paradise has borne; it is like the realised dreams of their youth. Have you never seen how a man has been governed and conducted throughout life by the one god-like image of his spring time? With what else than the bread-cart of clever selfishness would you replace this guiding Pole-star? Finally: what is the one thing needful to men? Certainly not the strength of the sacrifices to what is best—for let a God but once appear in reality, or, as in France, a Goddess (liberty), and man willingly divests himself of every thing human which the divinity does not require:—but man needs something other than strength; faith in, and contemplation of, a Deity who merits human sacrifices of a nobler kind. Men would show themselves as Gods under the visible leadership of a God. But if you expel that ideal from the heart, there vanish with it, temple, altar, sacrifice, and every thing.

CHAPTER II.

TRUTHFULNESS.

§ 109.

TRUTHFULNESS—I mean the fact of speaking truth intentionally, and even to the injury of self—is less a branch than a blossom of man's moral strength of character. Weaklings must lie, hate it as much as they may. One threatening look drives them into the midst of sin's net. The difference between the present and the middle age consists less in the existence of injustice, cruelty and lust—for these, especially the last, were abundant enough before the discovery of America—than in the want of truthfulness. The first sin on the earth—happily the devil was guilty of it on the tree of knowledge—was a lie; and the last will surely be a lie too. The world is punished for the increase of truths by the decrease of truthfulness.

§ 110.

Lying, that devouring cancer of the inner man, is more severely judged and defined by the feeling of nations, than by philosophers. The Greeks, who suffered their gods to commit as many crimes with impunity as their present representatives, the gods of the earth, do, yet condemned them for perjury—that root and quintessence of a lie—to pass a year of lifelessness under the ground in Tartarus, and then to endure nine years of torments. The ancient Persian taught his child nothing in the whole circle of morality but truthfulness. The grammatic resemblance of his language to the German beautifully shows also the moral resemblance of the people. Anton* tells us that lying is originally derived from to lie, i. e. to be prostrate, probably in reference to the abject slave who dare raise neither body nor mind. Lying and stealing, (which, as an acted lie, deprives of honour though murder does not) and a box on the ear, which the ancient German dreaded more than a wound, are brought into close connection by our language in its proverbs: and our near relatives, the English, know of no more abusive epithet than liar. The German tournaments were closed to the liar as well as the murderer.† I grant, however, that in the greatest of all tournaments, war, the greatest lying opened the lists of knightly exercise in war to a prince with whom no true treaty or peace could be made.

Can this abhorrence of false words be merely grounded on the violation of mutual rights and confidence, and the injury arising from broken contracts? It is contradicted by the fact that we more readily pardon lying actions than lying words. Action, mimicry and silence lie far oftener than the tongue, which men endeavour as long as possible to preserve pure from the hateful perpetration of a lie, the plague-spot of the inner man. Heavens! are we not already accustomed, without knowing it, to innumerable fictions of law and of poetry—to political secret articles, mesne tenures, vice-men, masters of ceremonies, comedians and rehearsals of comedies, false hair, false teeth, false calves, and many other things of a similar kind; and yet are we thereby in the smallest degree less shocked when a man utters a deliberate lie? What deceptions there are everywhere, from the otherwise lie-hating London, where three-fourths of the current-money is false,‡ to Pekin, where wooden hams are sold wrapped up in pig's skin!§ Since an honourable soldier and

* History of the German Nation, i. 66.

† Schmidt's History of the Germans, vol. iv.

‡ Colquhoun.

§ Grosier.

gentleman is less ashamed of a fraud and a bankruptcy than of a lie, at the bare reproach of which he will shoot himself—and since men of the world, and even moralists, permit themselves ambiguity of action rather than an actual lie—and since, finally, no blush is caused by any sin so burning as that produced by a lie—can words be something higher than deeds, the tongue than the hand? These questions cannot be perfectly answered by the mimic ambiguity of actions, compared with the simplicity of speech; for actions are not always ambiguous, and men will often consider before speaking decidedly, when they would not before acting. Men are not ashamed to undermine and bear ill-will towards other men, but they are ashamed openly to tell a lie.

§ 111.

What is it that makes it so unholy? It is this: two individual beings are stationed with regard to each other as upon different islands, and locked up within prison-bars of the bones, and behind the curtain of the skin. Mere motion shows me only life, but not its internal cause. The animated eye of a Raffaele's Madonna often speaks to us from the canvas, which yet houses no mind; wax figures are hollow; and the ape, our mocking image, is dumb. In what glorified form, then, does the human soul reveal itself? In speech only; in reason thus made man; in this audible freedom. I speak of universal innate language, without which all its peculiarities, such as modes of verbal expression, were neither comprehensible nor possible. Since instinct and mechanism can imitate all other signs of life, it is by speech only that the freedom of the creative thinker in a free world of thought is revealed to another; and this herald and ambassador (Bath-kol)* of freedom lays the foundations of morality by announcing individuals, like kings, to one another. The fetters of the tongue are the fetters of the soul; and there are no customs save the customs of language. The testament of the soul is opened by the mouth, and its last will made known. It is by the present conversion of mobile speech into quiet writing and painting, by this strict imprisonment of the breath of the soul, that both the power of language and the blackness of a lie are visibly diminished. For, since every thing is but a sign, it follows that every sign can be again signified even to infinity.

* Bath-kol, Hebrew, "Daughter of the Voice," which is to say, the Divine revelation after the cessation of the revelation through the prophets.

But now if a fellow-being, another living soul, come to me and utter a deliberate lie, how annihilating! His soul has fled away from me and left but its fleshly house behind; what he then says, since it is not the soul which speaks, is as meaningless as the wind which, with all its howling, expresses no pain. A word often effaces or explains an action; but the reverse scarcely ever occurs. It must be a long course of action which will remove the thorn from one word, or restore the trusted use of the tongue. The whole enchanted palace of a man's thoughts is rendered invisible by the single blast of a lie, for one lie is the mother of all lies. What can I say to him who is, or carries about with him, his own talking machine, and may have thoughts quite different from those he sounds on his machine? Moreover, he gives me—what is no partial but a universal injury—instead of my soul, a machine; instead of my truths, falsehoods; and breaks down the bridge of mind, or at least converts it into a bridge which he can let down for himself, but draw up against others.

§ 112.

And now back to our dear children! During the first five years they say neither what is true, nor what is false—they merely talk. Their talking is thinking aloud; and since the one half of thought is frequently a yes, and the other a no, and both escape them (though not us), they seem to lie when they are merely talking to themselves. Further: at first they find great pleasure in exercising their new art of speech, and so they often talk nonsense only for the sake of hearing their acquisitions in language. They frequently do not understand some word that you have said—little children, for instance, often confuse to-day, to-morrow, yesterday, as well as numbers and degrees of comparison, and so give rather a mistaken than a false reply. Again, they use their tongues more in sport than earnest, as may be seen in the long discourses they hold with their puppets, as a minister or an author does with his; and they easily apply this sportive talking to living people. Children always fly to the warm sunny side of hope; if the bird or the dog have gone away, they will say, without any further reason, It will come back again. And, since they cannot altogether separate their hopes, that is their fancies, from copies or truths, their own self-deception assumes the appearance of a lie. For instance, a truth-speaking little girl related to me frequent appearances of the infant Christ,* and what he had said, done, &c. It is worthy of consideration whether children, when they poetise a lie, do not often relate remembered dreams, which must necessarily be confounded by them with real occurrences. To this class belongs that talkative teasing and joking† often seen in eight or ten year old boys, which arises from superabundance of animal spirits.

In all these cases, when the form of a lie is not to be shown in any dark glass, say merely,—“Don’t talk nonsense, speak seriously.”

Finally, an untruth about what is to come is often confounded with an untruth about what has happened. Now if, in the case of grown-up men, we do not consider the breach of an official oath, having reference to the future only, equally culpable with the black perjury which relates to the past, we should in a still greater degree in the case of children, before whose little ken time and space are magnified and to whom a day is as inscrutable as a year to us, clearly distinguish between the untruthfulness of promises and the untruthfulness of statements. Something very different, and much worse, is the narrative-lie which seeks to gain some future thing by lying.

Truthfulness, which would offer even a bloody sacrifice

* The infant Christ is, in Germany, feigned to be the sender of the presents which adorn the Christmas tree.—TRANS.

† For the true liar seldom jokes, and the true wit does not lie, from the sharp open Swift back to Erasmus, who even experienced a physical antipathy to a liar, as also to fish.—PARAVICINI, Singularia de Viris Clavis, Cent. ii. 38.

to its word as its word, is a godlike blossom on an earthly plant; therefore, it is not the first but the last virtue in order of time. The simple savage is full of deceit, both in words and actions; the peasant, under the influence of some trifling danger, will tell a lie about what is past; but he considers it dishonourable to tell a prospective lie, and keeps his word. And yet you can require in a child, whom you have yet to educate, the last and noblest fruits of truth? How much you err is proved by the fact, that lying children—all other circumstances being equal—have grown up into truthful men: I appeal to the Rousseau's ribbon-lie of every conscience.

There are, however, two decided lies with regard to the two times;—no other lies are possible than either those which look forward to the future or backward to the past. The first is seen when, the child endeavours to secure himself some booty by lying words or deeds; the second, when he denies, through fear, his own actions.

What is to be done in both these circumstances?

§ 113.

What is to be done before they occur? That is the question.

The child, blinded and, as it were, imprisoned by his own existence, acquires his first knowledge of morality by observing others; and only perceives the hatefulness of a heard lie, not of one spoken by himself. Show him, then, the lofty throne of truthfulness in others, compared with the abyss of their falsehood; be what you desire him to be; and frequently repeat that you do even the most indifferent things because you had previously said you would. It has a powerful effect on the little heart if he occasionally hear his father, who seems to him a kind of free universal monarch, complain;—but mark, it must only be in true cases, for truthfulness in the child cannot grow at the expense of truthfulness in the parents—that, for instance, he would rather not go out with him, but, having promised to do so, he must now unwillingly keep his word.

If the child have promised something, remind him frequently of it as the time approaches, but without using other words than "you said so," and at last compel him to the performance. But if he have done something, you cannot be too sparing in your inquiries, which may easily become so painful. The younger the child is the fewer questions you ought to ask, the more ought you to seem all-knowing or remain ignorant. Do you not consider that you apply a fiery trial, such as Huss and other martyrs have endured, to children—to whom a threatening father is a penal judge, a prince and a fate, his rod a Jove's thunderbolt, and the next questioning moment an eternity of hellish torments—when, by your concealed anger and the prospect of punishment after confession, you place them in the dangerous position of choosing whether they shall obey instinct or an idea? To truth belongs freedom; the criminal stands without fetters during trial; and man, the reverse of Proteus, speaks the truth when free. The more free the education, the more truthful is the child. All truth-loving ages and nations, from the German to the British, have been free; lying China is a prison, and romanizare (romancing) meant lying when the Romans were slaves.

At the same time do not let the remission of punishment be the incitement and reward of truth: an act of indemnity which can as little make the child good and true as escaped suffering the unpunished thief. If you must inquire, use affectionate words, and apply to the lie the pain you would spare the child.

But if a lie be proved against the child, solemnly utter the judgment "guilty of lying," with a shocked tone and look, with all the horror due to this sin against nature and the Holy Ghost, and inflict the punishment. The only punishments I would permit for lying are such as affect the honour, and can be removed as solemnly, suddenly and completely as inflicted, so as not to lose their effect by gradual diminution. The Iroquois blacken the faces of those who celebrate their heroes with lying songs. The Siamese sew up the lips of lying women, as if they were wounds. I have nothing to say against the blackening; on the contrary, I have myself occasionally punished a lie severely by marking a spot of ink on the brow, which was not to be washed off without permission, and which eat deeply into the conscience. But I am more in favour of the Siamese plan of closing the lips, I mean of forbidding speaking to those who have spoken wickedly. The same principle which led the ancient Germans to cut out the tongues of the Roman advocates sends the misused member, which serves the mind worse than the stomach, into the convent of La Trappe. I think this punishment which petrifies the tongue, as Paul did the serpent at Malta, is juster, lighter and more definite than that which Rousseau and Kant would inflict on a lying child; namely, not to believe him for a time, which only means to seem not to believe him. For in this case the judge himself lies during the punishment for lying: and will not the little culprit arrive at the knowledge of this pretence by his consciousness of speaking the truth? Moreover, how and when will you make the necessary return from disbelief to confidence? At the same time, Kant's punishment may occasionally have a beneficial tendency in the case of grown-up daughters.

Never tell any child under six years old to conceal anything, even though it were a pleasure you were planning for some one you love. The clear sky of child-like open-heartedness must not be covered even by the morning glow of shame; and your instructions will soon teach him to add secrets of his own to yours. The heroic virtue of silence requires for its practice the powers of ripening reason. Reason teaches us to be silent; the heart teaches us to speak.

For this and other reasons I consider it wrong, at least for the first five years, to forbid a child to ask for any thing; especially if the mother append the poisonous sugar of a promise to give it afterwards. For, are wishes sins? or is the confession of a wish a sin? During the silence attached to the gift will not a longing for enjoyment and reward, and the power of dissimulation, be maintained and fostered? And is it not much easier to give an entire refusal after the short question than after the long waiting? This mistaken command arises from the maternal inability to utter an immediate and decisive "no."

Do not despise all kinds of little helps. For instance,

do not press the child for an immediate answer; a lie easily escapes from haste, and must then be supported by another. Give him a little time for reflection before he speak. Further, remember in your most indifferent promises and declarations—and all the more because they are indifferent to you—that children have a better memory than you about all things, but especially for and against you, and that you must protect them from the dangerous appearance of your own innocent over-hasty untruthfulness.

The author has occasionally asked himself whether children's sense of truth may not be injured by the acting of charades and little comedies. Besides the necessary excitement of instant creation, children's charades have also this advantage over children's comedies,—that mere charades are only a higher imitation of the puppet games which children, even at an earlier age, played extempore with their dolls and their companions without any injury to truthfulness; as if, even then, they would take refuge from the cold winds of real life behind the shelter of imaginary life. In charades the child lives,—at once poet and player—in a strange character, it is true, but still not in a borrowed one, and uttering the words prompted by the eager moment. In plays he coldly learns by heart the representation (simulatio) of a character and certain words, in order afterwards to give a lively representation of both. Truth has also this advantage in charades; that the child must at all events reply from his own mind to the changing questions of the time; whereas, in a learnt comedy, he brings with him every answer prepared for weeks. And since even great actors do not consider the advantage to be gained by pure universal human nature, without regard to artistic effect, as the matter of chief importance, we should exempt children from an exercise in which the advantage is more doubtful than the injury.

Our ancestors magnified every lie into perjury by always pointing out to children the universal presence of God: and why should not this warning, which converts every promise into an oath and doubles the sin while rendering it more difficult of commission to a conscience alive to the Divinity, be still held up to children?

Finally, since truthfulness, as a conscious virtue and sacrifice, is the blossom, nay, the pollen, of the whole moral growth, it can only grow with its growth, and open when it has reached its height. You have only to keep away weeds while you give it freedom, save it from overpowering temptations, and forbid all soul-bending customs (such as obliging a child to return thanks for a whipping, and to make compliments to strangers).

CHAPTER III.

EDUCATION OF THE AFFECTIONS.

§ 114.

I SAID, in the hundred-and-first section, that love is the second hemisphere of the moral world, that it turns to what is external, as honour does to what is internal, and so forth. The holy essence of love has been fathomed neither by the "fraternity of novelists who, like selfish women, mingle regard to self with the beloved object, nor by merely intellectual philosophers, who view its depth partly as an instinct utterly without and below their categorical imperative (law of morals), and partly as mere justice, a kind of rational regard; to such men love and poetry seem a pair of superfluous wings disfiguring the useful arms behind which they are placed. Only Plato, Hemsterhuis, Jacobi, Herder, and a few like them, have brought to the love of wisdom (philosophy) the wisdom of love. He who called love the positive law of morality, will at least not be condemned by one great man—by Jesus Christ, the founder of the first religion of love in the midst of a Judaism inimical to all other nations, and an age inimical to philanthropy. But the essence of love—this all-sustaining deity, the true divine unity of all, in which the individual soul feels more than it comprehends—demands another place for examination.

§ 115.

Love is an innate, but variously apportioned, power and warmth of the heart; there are cold and warm blooded souls as well as bodies. Many are born knights of the Love of their neighbour,* as Montaigne; many are armed neutrals against humanity. Whether this power be a holy burning bush, or only a single kindling spark, education must care for it in two ways, by protecting and by developing it.

By protecting it I mean this. The child begins with selfishness which affects us as little as that of animals; because the soul, darkly hidden under its various wants, cannot yet feel its way to another, but incorporates others, so to speak, with itself. In so far the child finds nothing lifeless without, any more than within, itself; it spreads its soul as a universal soul over every thing. A little girl of two years old—and all children do the same—personified other things than those I mentioned in the earlier part of this work: she said, for instance, of the door which was opened, “It wants to go out.”—“I will kiss my hand to the spring.”—“Is the moon good? and does it never cry?” This animation of all lifeless things, which is peculiar to children, is another reason why we should restrain them from ever harshly alluding to an inanimate object.

§ 116.

Love in the child, as in the animal, exists as an instinct; and this central fire frequently, but not always, breaks through its outer crust in the form of compassion. A child is often indifferent, not merely to the sufferings of animals and to those of persons unconnected with himself (except when the cry of pain finds an echo in his own heart), but even to those of relatives. Innocent children will frequently find pleasure in standing on the place where another is to be punished. A second observation, founded on experience, is, that boys, when approaching near to manhood, show the least affection, the most love of teasing, the greatest destructiveness, the most selfishness and cold-heartedness; just as the coldness of the night increases twofold shortly before the rising of the sun.

* The order of knighthood to which I allude, was founded by the Queen of Charles III. of Spain.

But the sun comes, and warms the world; the superabundance of power becomes love: the strong stem encloses and protects the pith; the teasing lad becomes the affectionate young man. The other observation of childish heartlessness, recorded above, vanishes in the very opposite quality of tenderness, so soon as the visible pain of the culprit, by its increase, affects the child; every fresh wound makes a tearful eye.

Consequently, there is not so much need to ingraft the buds of affection, as to remove the moss and briars of selfishness which hide them from the sun. Every body would gladly show affection, might he or dared he but do it. Wherever a pulse beats, a heart reposes in the back ground; if there be but some little impulse towards love, the whole essence of love lies behind it.

But you plant the selfish weed, instead of eradicating it, if, in the presence of children, you pass contemptuous, though just, judgments on your neighbours, or even your town. How else can the child learn to love the world than by learning to love what is daily around him? And can we love what we despise? Or will your sermons warm him into love for the objects you have taught him to scorn? Since every distinction of your children above their neighbours, whether it consist in position, behaviour, or even more brilliant instruction, reminds them of themselves at the expense of others, this distinction very soon and very easily passes into hatred. Never say to your children that other children are ill brought-up. I have frequently seen whole families converted, by similar thoughtless and perverse actions, into watchful and blockading troops of hatred; whole houses built full of pouting corners, where every child, full of itself, regarded its own demands as the weights, those of others as the goods to be weighed, and expected universal love and admiration. If a large town have the injurious effect on children's hearts of compelling them to assume the neutrality of great people, because so many of whom they are ignorant, and to whom they are indifferent, constantly pass before them, much more must a village harm them if they hate and despise as many people as they know, that is to say, every body.

The simple command, "Forgive the sinner," means with children, Do not regard him as one: you will succeed better if you teach them to distinguish the guilty accomplice—self, from its stains; to judge the deed, not the doer; in order especially, by the comparison of things and rights, to prevent, or to exalt, the comparison of persons. Praise the action, not the child. Parents mention their children too often by name. Do not say, "Ah, the good little Louisa!" but say, "That is good,"—or, at most, "You are as good as Mary."

§ 117.

But while setting forth the repression of selfishness as the one thing needful for exciting kindness to others, we must observe—as is just—that love requires nothing, save not to be obstructed. This leads us to the second means of maintaining and exciting love: it is this—place another being in sufficiently close and living contact with your child and he will love it; because man is so good that the devil, so to speak, has only carved and placed a black frame round the divine image. The stem of the individual heart nourishes with the same sap its own branches and those which are ingrafted on it.

The means of exciting love consist in identifying the child, as it were, with the life of others, and in reverence for life under every form.

Concerning this transposition into extraneous life, by which alone the goodness of our nature can unfold all its love, little needs here be printed because I have already printed much about it.* Individuals, yea, whole nations, have often died without having once even thought of themselves in any other position than their own; how difficult, then, must it be for the child to place himself in the position of others! Man usually opens himself to the reception of another's nature only when, in the contest between two other persons, he must transpose himself from the one into the other; but not, when he is a party concerned in the contest, by placing himself in the position of his opponent. Moreover, this representative method of viewing our neighbour is a kind of intuition, and, consequently, not always in our own power. I do not attempt to decide whether possibly older children may not be led to attain this intuitive perception at an earlier period than they else would by certain games; where one child, for instance, assumed the name and imitated the actions of another; or, by coloured pictures calling to mind similar situations. But there is something else which may be done to attain this end with better hope of success.

§ 118.

It is this: Teach a child to consider all animal life sacred—in short, give him the heart of a Hindoo, not the heart of a Cartesian philosopher.

I here speak of something higher than compassion for animals, though, of that also. Why has it been long remarked that children's cruelty to animals predicts cruelty to men, as the Old Testament sacrifices of beasts foreshadowed the New Testament sacrifice of a man? It is certain that, unless associated with other things, the little human being can only sympathise with those sufferings which speak in tones similar to his own. Consequently, the unusual cry of a tortured animal sounds to him only like the strange and amusing howl of the inanimate wind; but, as he sees life and voluntary motion, and even attributes them to inanimate forms, he sins against life when he separates them as though they were but machinery. Life itself should be sacred; every life, irrational as well as any other. And does the child, in fact, know of different kinds of life? Or is the heart, beating under bristles, feathers, or hard wing-covers, therefore any the less a heart?

Permit me a few words about the love of animals, and universal reverence for life!

Once, when man, a new and fresh creature, lived in the full world where one stream flows into another, he recognised in every thing the universal life of the Godhead, resembling an infinite tree of life which spreads the lowest insects, like roots, into the earth and sea, stands firm and strong with a trunk of huge powerful beasts, shoots into the air with boughs full of waving leaves, and finally puts forth men,—its tender blossoms—towards the sky. Then had not arisen that stupid human egotism which thinks that the whole animal kingdom, the peopled seas and deserts full of all their various happy living creatures, were given by God to men as tributary beasts, Michaelmas geese and tithe hens for their stomachs. The earth, Kepler's animal, had not yet become the metallic cow and the Balaam's ass of little man. But the old vanished world—some remnants of which are yet visible in eastern India—finding more life and more divinity in the flower, fast chained by its roots, than we now do in the free-moving beast, worshipped, in animal arabesques, in the living, moving, distorted images of the human form, the infinite Raffaele who perfected man. The forms of animals, repulsive to us, revealed to them the veil of Isis, or the Moses' covering of a deity. Hence the lower, but wonderful, beast* was worshipped much sooner than the human being; hence the Egyptians crowned human bodies with the heads of animals. The more childlike, simple and pious a nation, the greater its love of animals. In Surah there is a hospital for animals. The hero who had taken Nineveh saved it from destruction because of the multitude of its animals. The mercifulness of the Jews† towards animals was rewarded with long life. Even the punishment of animals, if they had participated with men in any crime, the thunders of excommunication hurled against them, and the weighing of their designs‡ in inflicting punishment, show the early regard felt for these eighth parts, and likenesses, of man. The Indian adoration of

* Vide Meiners.

† Michaelis, Mosaic law, v. iii.

‡ An ox which, among the Jews (according to the Gemara), was put to death for killing a Jew, but left unhurt after killing three heathens, was equally unpunished if he aimed at goring a heathen but killed a Jew.—Mischna, 6. Bafa kama, c. 4.

vegetable life passed into Greece under the form of Hamadryads and other deities dwelling in trees, and into the north under the form of punishment to all who injured trees.

I have often pictured to myself situations which would remove the common daily view of animals which, like mis-shapen human bodies, have fallen on to our globe from other worlds producing different forms. For instance; I have fancied an uninhabited island on which one man, nourished only by the bread fruit tree, had seen no living thing, nothing but waves and sky and his own reflection in the water, and from which he was suddenly transported to a country peopled with animated beings.

What an enchanted island full of embodied sprites and fairies! To the islander who knows no other form than his own, a hairy monkey grinning at him from a bough would seem a wicked spirit, or a misshapen man. The elephant approaches,—a shapeless, living mass; a whole family compressed into one huge two-eyed body,—a walking island of flesh: the lion comes like anger: the horse flies like victorious pride: little mad sprites, red, green, yellow, and six-footed, flutter about the island. A glorious wonder drops from the clouds, in which the two strong useful human arms are changed into burnished-gold hair or feathers, and its lips drawn out into a horn. Grey shapeless substances, with scarce formed limbs, swim in the waters: yellow creatures, like the masks of the furies, crawl about in the marshes: a single, long, smooth limb creeps up and pricks the wicked spirit on the bough, and he falls down: and then, when these strange dream-like figures began to speak each the language of an unknown world—as we might suppose the various nations of its planets assembled in the market-place of their sun—humming, screaming, howling, laughing—there, on the bough of a tree, sweet sounds from heaven, at its root wrathful hissings from Erebus: and then the battles and struggles of these animals, the injuries inflicted on them by each other, and yet their continued existence: and, finally, this mingled, fluttering, hurting, killing, caressing, reproducing life becomes an infinite breath of life, wherein the individual life flies like a tiny zephyrette

The one human soul forgets in itself the human race of the past, the present and the future, and places itself as the first figure before all others. How much more does it forget the inferior race of animals, the mouches volantes before an angel's eyes!

The so-called instinct of animals—this ass which perceives the angel's presence sooner than the prophet—ought to be regarded as the greatest miracle of creation, and also as the key and index to all other miracles; in so much as the riddle of the universe resembles those riddles which both describe the riddle and signify it. Animals should be rendered familiar to children in every possible way; for instance, by representing them as an anagram of a human being: thus the poor dog may be regarded as an old hairy man, whose mouth has become blackened and elongated, his ears pulled out, long nails appended to his shaggy paws, and so forth. Little animals must be brought nearer to the eye and heart by means of a magnifying glass. Thus we may become the friends of the denizens of a leaf. The prejudice which values life by the yard—why, then, are not elephants and whales ranked higher than ourselves?—disappears by the contemplation of the infinity which is the same in every living creature, and, like an infinite series in numbers, is increased by no finite additions; which is not affected, for instance, by the two million joints of a centipede, or the many thousand muscles of the willow-caterpillar. “How you would take care of a butterfly as big as an eagle, or of a grasshopper as large as a horse! And are not you little too?” Speak thus to the child.

Leibnitz replaced a little insect which he had examined for a long time uninjured on its leaf: be this a command for a child. The Stoic school declared that a man who killed a bird without any reason would just as readily kill his father: and the Egyptian priest considered it impious to destroy any animal except for sacrifice. These embody all the commandments of regard for life. Let animals be put to death only from necessity, as sacrifices, accidentally, hastily, involuntarily, defensively. If the long observation of some animal—say a frog—of its breathing, jumping mode of life and agonies, have converted this little animal, previously indifferent to the child, into a really living thing, he would, by killing it, destroy with its life his reverence for all life. Hence no domestic animal, a sheep, a cow, should ever be killed in a child's presence; at all events, if his rising love of animals is to be encouraged, instead of repressed (as some nations have been led to eat men from eating monkeys); the hard necessity of the case, the careful tending previously, and the sudden easy death, must be cast as a veil of darkness over the slaughtering hand. Even a hunter should never punish his hounds with true hunters' cruelty before a child, especially because their cries express their pain so clearly. Cooks say you should show no pity in killing an animal, for else it dies harder: this superstition at once reveals and hides the true woman's sympathy which it forbids.

To the child's eye admit all living things into the human family; so the greater reveals to him the less. Breathe a living soul into every thing; and even describe the lily, which he wantonly tears from its organic existence, as the daughter of a fair mother who stands in the bed and nourishes her little white child with sap and dew.

I do not refer to any mere empty exercise of compassion in the school of others' sufferings, but to an exercise of religion in the consecration of life, of the deity ever present in the trees and in the human brain. The love of animals, like maternal love, arises from no expectation of reciprocated advantage, still less from selfishness, and has the further advantage of always finding an object on which to manifest itself.

Oh! the beautiful time will, must come, when the beast-loving Brahmins shall dwell in the cold north and make it warm; when the heart, having rejected its worst and cruellest sins, shall also lay aside those which slowly poison it; when man, who now honours the multiform part of humanity, shall also begin to spare, and finally to protect, the animated ascending and descending scale of living creatures, so as no more to offer to the Great First Cause the hateful sight of thickly veiled, it is true, but wide-extended, animal suffering. And wherefore must such times come? Because worse times have passed away: time carries away the national debts (mostly bloody debts) of humanity: strand-right is now strand-wrong; the traffic in negroes is gradually becoming unlawful. Only the toughest, harshest barbarism of past ages—war—remains yet to be vanquished by our innate anti-barbarism.

§ 119.

The third love-potion, like the third degree of comparison which admits of no more, is love for love. If love be the highest, what further can it seek than itself, the highest? A heart can only be held by a heart, the fairest setting of the loveliest jewel. Only the tumult and confusion in the nest of self can so darken us that we value pure love for another less than that for ourselves.

But do not attempt to found this love in children by caresses, the thirsty springs of love. These soon both grow cold and make cold. I have often seen children, especially young ones, suddenly start away from the caresses of love to the quietest observation of some mere trifle, just like the old epic poets of early nations in their descriptions. In grown-up persons that would betray a withered heart which in children only shows that its buds are still closed.

You reveal the form of love to a child less by self-sacrificing actions—for these he, as yet unreasoning and selfish, does not regard—than by the mother tongue of love, affectionate words and looks. Love, to appear untroubled, must be embodied in nothing save the tender mimicry taught by Nature herself: a look, a word, expresses it directly, a gift only indirectly, by translation. And just so in marriage: love is not preserved by gifts, pleasures and sacrifices, whose influence soon disappears, but by words and looks of love. Moreover, children manifest more love towards present-giving strangers than to present-giving parents; but, on the contrary, not so much to caressing strangers as to caressing parents.

Let the child occasionally see the fiery pillar of love move before strangers. Contemplation of the mutual love of others sanctifies the beholder, because it cannot be accompanied by selfish desires. But there is one evil

